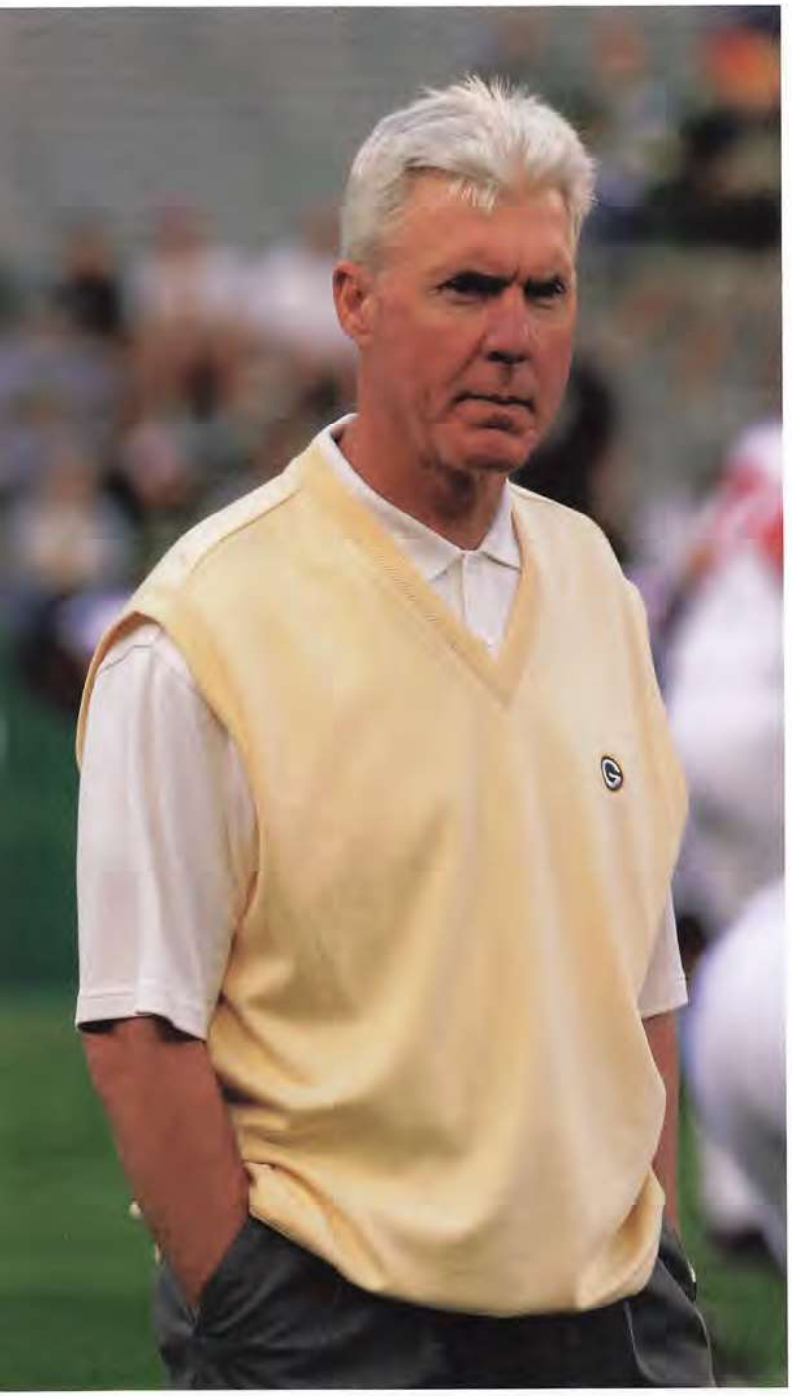
Packers Roster Continues Positive Development



Packers General Manager Ted Thompson

VETERANS AND RECENT ACQUISITIONS FORM SOLID FOUNDATION, PLUS ADD DEPTH

By Mike Spofford

When it comes to managing an NFL roster, specifically deciding who makes the team and who doesn't at the end of training camp each summer, the job of a general manager is not easy.

In fact, in a masochistic sort of way, a general manager's job from the end of one season to the beginning of the next is to make those final roster decisions as difficult as possible.

That's done by acquiring new players to compete with the current ones in the hopes that the competition will push players to maximize their abilities. Then, the more players improve and approach their potential, the harder it is to decide which ones to keep on the final roster, and which ones to let go.

"That's a healthy thing," Packers GM Ted Thompson said. "As a former player, it's not the most comfortable thing, because I was one of the people they were always after.

"But it's great if you get to the end of this and you have only one spot for two players, and both of those players warrant being on your team, you think they're professional and good guys and all that sort of thing. It's difficult to have to make that decision, but it's good for the organization."

That's the approach Thompson has taken to his job in each of his three years in Green Bay, and heading into training camp in 2007, he appears to have set himself up for his most difficult summer of decision-making yet.

In directing the last three Green Bay drafts, Thompson has selected 34 players, 27 of whom are among the 80-plus players in uniform as the 2007 training camp begins.

Add to that dozens other first- and second-year players acquired by Thompson over the past two years who are fighting to establish their careers – players like Ruvell Martin, Carlyle Holiday and Shaun Bodiford all battling at wide receiver, for instance – plus roughly a dozen seasoned veterans, led by quarterback Brett Favre, whose jobs are safe, and it becomes apparent just how challenging it will be to trim down to only 53 players for the season opener against Philadelphia on Sept. 9.

But no matter how many capable players might be let go, even some of his own draft picks, Thompson believes it's the best way to go about building a football team, and improving it from one year to the next. In short, the harder his job is at the time of the final roster cutdown, the more progress that's being made in getting the Packers back to the playoffs and in contention for a championship.

"I think it's important to add competition – it adds quality to your core and it adds depth in case of injury down the road," he said. "I think it's vitally important, and I think it's part of, especially with some of the young guys, putting their feet to the fire so their maturation process speeds up as quickly as it possibly can."

Thompson has taken some criticism for not stocking the roster with more veterans, and pursuing more established players in free agency. But that maturation of young players is what Thompson and Head Coach Mike McCarthy both had in mind when they repeatedly referred to the Packers "improving from within" during this past offseason.

The 27 Thompson draft picks currently on the roster don't even account for half of the players with three years or less of NFL experience that participated in the Packers' offseason strength and conditioning program. The young talent, though largely unproven, is stocked at positions such as running back, wide receiver, offensive line and defensive back. Obviously not all of these players can make the team, and how much up-and-coming players like running back Vernand Morency, receiver Greg Jennings, linemen Daryn Colledge, Jason Spitz and Tony Moll, and safety Nick Collins, among others, can improve is what everyone is waiting to see.

"We have a fair number of young players, so I think our team is in a position to improve quicker," Thompson said. "Usually it's the younger players who will kind of grow into their bodies and mature from a physical standpoint, moreso than veterans. That's what we're referring to in that we're in a position to be able to improve more with our existing players."

Thompson witnessed, and assisted with, this very type of building process as vice president of football operations for the Seattle Seahawks from 2000-04. With limited emphasis on free agency, a paramount focus on the draft, and an influx of youth to bolster depth, Seattle ended a three-year playoff drought in 2003, went to the playoffs again the next year, and then, just after Thompson left for Green Bay, went to the Super Bowl following the 2005 season.

Believing wholeheartedly in his approach and seeing it produce success out west, Thompson, upon getting settled in Green Bay, also hired a head coach in McCarthy who subscribes to the same team-building philosophy.

During his extended coaching stints in Kansas City and New Orleans, McCarthy was known to help players such as quarterbacks Rich Gannon and Jake Delhomme (then a backup for the Saints) and receiver Joe Horn, all future Pro Bowlers, improve and develop during the offseason. So he brings a structure and a track record to Green Bay that goes hand-in-hand with Thompson's overall approach.

"I think it's a common philosophy shared by both, that we both had prior to working together, and it obviously became one philosophy when he hired me," McCarthy said. "To go off past experience, he had the opportunity to be a big part of building that team with Seattle, and you see how he did it.

"You can see history in a sense repeating itself as far as what his core beliefs are and how you build a football team. You can see there's a philosophical belief in building from within, and trying to develop our younger players at all costs."

That common ground helped forge a strong partnership between Thompson and McCarthy from the time of McCarthy's hiring in January 2006. Both leaders emphasize that they work well together, and there's an unwavering confidence that their approach to building and developing the team will produce noticeable improvement and the corresponding results.

"He and I think a lot alike in a lot of ways," Thompson said. "We do believe there is a right way and a wrong way to have a team, not only in personnel but on the coaching side.

"Ultimately there are decisions he has to make that he has to stand out there by himself, and the same goes for me. But we communicate very well and we talk every day, and that's good."

Says McCarthy: "We're both in leadership roles, and I have a lot of respect for the way he goes about his business, his expertise in this business. I'm enjoying watching our partnership grow."

They're also enjoying seeing the harmony at the top of the football operations parallel the chemistry in the locker room.

It's certainly never a given that dozens of intensely competitive athletes are going to get along on a daily basis. But when it comes to acquiring new players through the draft or free agency, Thompson and McCarthy both strongly consider a player's character and how well he fits with the team they're trying to build.

"The main thing Mike and I try to stress is not necessarily the individual players - obviously you have to have talent and want-to and all that - but I think the most important thing we've tried to put in place, even more than it has been in the past, is the whole team concept," Thompson said. "That the group is stronger than the individual.

"And we felt from the get-go it was important to work on the locker room, and make sure in terms of the psyche of the players that it's a comfortable place to be, a place where they can enjoy each other's company, and I think the team has grown together in that regard."

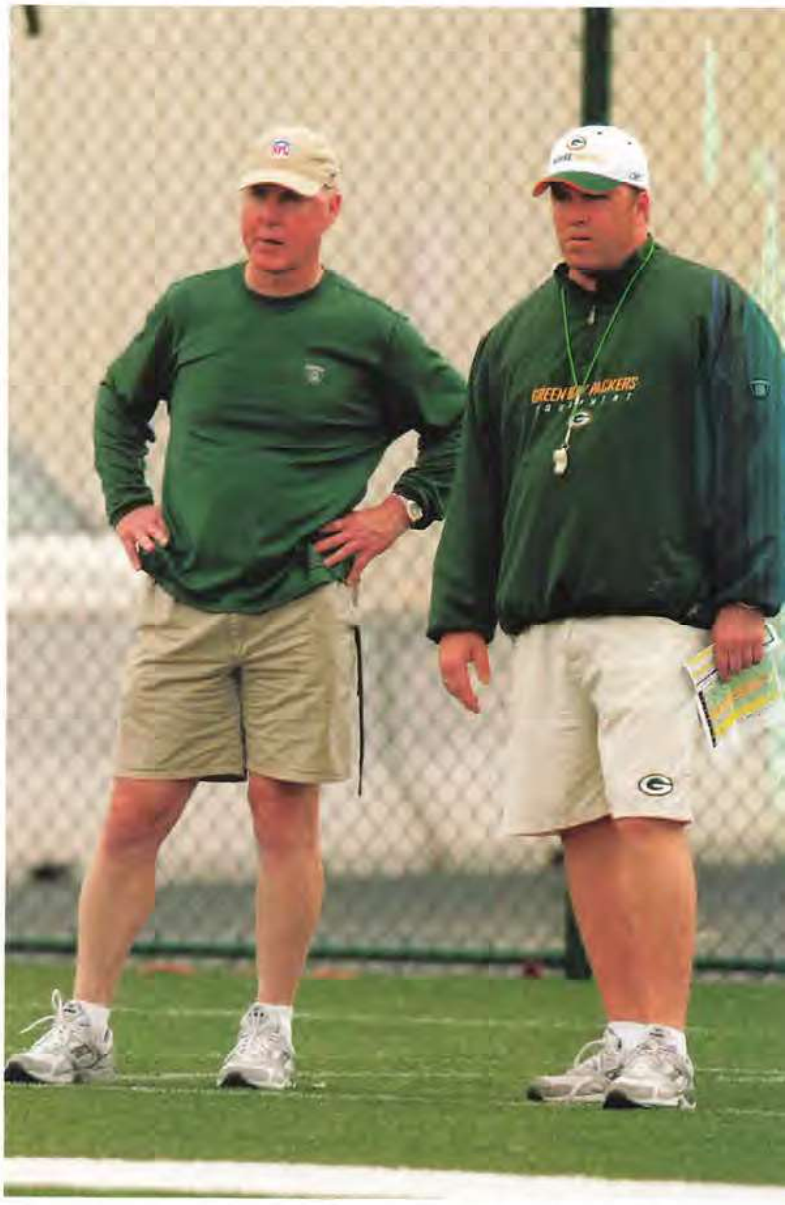
So, at what point does a GM know when it's all coming together? When the roster competition, player development, and locker room camaraderie are in place to take a team to a new level?

It's when the GM's job becomes even tougher yet, because the roster is so deep he has starting-caliber players handling special teams roles, and in this era of free agency, keeping that team together becomes nearly impossible. Yet the chemistry is so strong that, at least while a championship appears within reach, all players are willing to perform their roles with team goals in mind.

That's what Thompson recalls the Packers had in 1996, when the Super Bowl XXXI champions were loaded with stars in the starting lineup but also possessed the league's best special teams, filled with players who could have been starters elsewhere.

That's the team that taught Thompson, as he's fond of saying, "You can never have enough good players." It's the team he's trying to build in Green Bay again, no matter how hard it makes his job.

"When you get to that point, that's when you're doing what you're supposed to do," Thompson said. "We're not there yet, but we're working at it."



Thompson and McCarthy share many similar philosophies that have benefitted the Packers.

McCarthy Improves Team's Record and Mind-Set

By Mike Spofford

Coming off a 4-12 season in 2005, the Green Bay Packers on multiple occasions appeared headed for their second straight losing season in 2006.

There was the 1-4 record at the bye week, with three home losses already. There was the 3-5 mark after an agonizing game at Buffalo. And there was the 4-8 record, which included humbling home defeats to the Patriots and Jets, with four games remaining.

At each of those stages, a first-year NFL head coach might have been inclined to throw up his hands and declare, "This isn't working." He might have thought it was time to question his instincts, overhaul the playbook, shake up the roster, or make a change on his coaching staff.

But to Mike McCarthy, any and all of those reactions would have defined a panic. And not only would a perceived panic have undermined his still-in-its-infancy leadership, but to panic would have been to over-react and to lose sight of the meticulous thought process behind all the planning and structure he began putting in place as the Packers' 14th head coach from the day he was hired.

So McCarthy didn't do anything dramatic. More to the point, he didn't blink.

"I've always believed in my abilities as a head football coach, and I felt all along we were doing the right things, going about it the right way," McCarthy said, specifically referring to being 4-8 with a three-game losing streak that included a 35-0 loss to New England and a 38-10 defeat to the New York Jets.

"Obviously, anytime you encounter adversity like that, it potentially creates distractions, but it's just something where we had to stay focused and deal with them. I never questioned the plan, and I didn't see any signs of anybody else questioning it."

The short end to the story is that McCarthy's persistence and belief in his structure, and the players' and coaches' belief in him, paid off. The Packers won four straight games to finish the season 8-8, barely missing the NFC playoffs on a tiebreaker and avoiding what could have been consecutive losing seasons for the first time since 1990-91.

"If you watched us practice at the end of the year, we were clearly a football team that was improving week to week in everything we did - the classroom environment, the practice environment, and I strongly believe it eventually carried over to the games on Sunday," McCarthy said.

The longer version is that the season-ending turnaround didn't simply come out of nowhere. There were strong indications along the way that the team was capable of sustaining some success, and McCarthy was tuned in to those signs, knowing the foundation for a winning streak, and for the future of his team, was being built properly.

Perhaps the most notable sign came in Week 7 at Miami. The Packers had just lost a heartbreaker to St. Louis in Week 5, when a red-zone fumble in the waning seconds eliminated the chance to score either a game-winning touchdown or game-tying field goal.

That was followed by the bye week, and the team was 1-4 with three of its next four games on the road, starting with one in a triple-digit heat index in South Florida.

A potentially pivotal game couldn't have started any worse. Left tackle Chad Clifton was up the entire night before the game, violently ill with a stomach virus. Rookie Daryn Colledge was told about an hour before kickoff he'd have to take Clifton's place protecting quarterback Brett Favre's blindside and blocking Miami's premier pass rusher, Jason Taylor, who blew past Colledge for two fumble-forcing sacks in the first quarter. The first one was recovered by the Dolphins, setting up an easy touchdown for an early lead.

But from there, McCarthy and the coaching staff made the proper protection adjustments, and Taylor was kept relatively quiet the rest of the day. The offense hit its stride with picture-perfect execution of the new zone-blocking scheme for a 70-yard TD run by Ahman Green, and the defense battled to the end in the scorching on-field heat for 83 snaps, including 62 pass attempts, turning in four sacks and three interceptions.

"I thought our defense played phenomenal in that game," McCarthy said of the 34-24 victory, which he called the proudest of his rookie season. "With Miami's approach to throw the ball and spread the game out, to try to run us into the ground in that heat, it was a true tribute to the character of our defense. I thought they were incredible the way they stood up to them.

"The offense played well. We had the big run when we needed it. I was so proud not only of the win, going down there and coming off the bye week at 1-4, but also the way we won. I thought it was an excellent team victory, and it spoke volumes about our players."

Another critical contest came three weeks later, right after the maddening defeat at Buffalo during which the Packers outgained the Bills by nearly 250 yards but were undone by four turnovers, two inside the Buffalo 5-yard line and another that gave the Bills a defensive score.

"I THINK IT'S VERY IMPORTANT TO STAY IN TOUCH WITH REALITY, AS BASIC AN IDEA AS THAT SOUNDS...I THINK IT'S IMPORTANT WHEN PEOPLE ARE SUCCESSFUL TO CONGRATULATE THEM, BUT ALSO BREAK DOWN WHY THEY'RE SUCCESSFUL AND CONTINUE TO BUILD OFF THE KEY COMPONENTS TO THAT."

-Mike McCarthy

McCarthy helped improve the Packers record to 8-8 in '06, four more wins than the team had the previous season.

Trying to correct all that at Minnesota's Metrodome against the division-rival Vikings was no small task, but the Packers won the way teams must win in hostile environments. They got the early lead, jumping ahead 10-0 with the help of a turnover from the defense. They hit a big play to quiet the crowd, an 82-yard catch-and-run by Donald Driver just before halftime. And on 42 passes and 26 rushes, they didn't commit a single turnover.

Adding to the value of the victory was that McCarthy used the performance as a lesson for his team, just as he had done the previous week in Buffalo.

"I think it's very important to stay in touch with reality, as basic an idea as that sounds," McCarthy said. "I think it's important when people are successful to congratulate them, but also break down why they're successful and continue to build off the key components to that."

"I think the same philosophy holds true when they encounter failure. I think it's important to break it down and identify clearly what happened, and within that, you're staying in tune with the football team as far as taking an everyday approach of (knowing) what we have to do to continue to get better. That's something I never lost sight of."

McCarthy's matter-of-fact review of each game helped the team appropriately handle both success and failure, and there was plenty of each with three straight losses followed by the four straight wins to conclude the season.

The ups and downs were always evident on the scoreboard but didn't necessarily permeate through the entire team, mostly thanks to McCarthy.

"Through some very difficult times last year, he was remarkably steadfast and steady, and I appreciated that," General Manager Ted Thompson said. "Because it can be a little lonely, too. These are two great jobs we have, but there's not that many people when things are going bad that you can talk to about it. I was impressed with him."

That's strong validation for a first-time head coach, but McCarthy is as aware as anyone that any further validation will come only with progress.

The Packers' last playoff appearance was in 2004, when they finished a three-year run as NFC North Division champions. For McCarthy, the quest to return to the postseason begins with getting back atop the division, and the groundwork to reclaim that top spot was laid with a 5-1 mark against NFC North foes in 2006.

McCarthy made five playoff appearances as an assistant coach, and to make the postseason in his second year as a head coach would be a noteworthy accomplishment to be sure.

But it's much more a team goal than just a personal one for McCarthy. And it's not the only goal, but one that would move the Packers closer to a championship, the ultimate objective. In the same way he's never consumed by one game or one moment, it's all about the bigger picture and the long-term fortunes of the franchise to McCarthy.

"It would mean a lot because it would mean the plan is working and we're making progress," McCarthy said.

"Getting to the playoffs is definitely a stepping stone to our next world championship."

Appointed in the Right Direction

Newly-Appointed Packers Vice Presidents Will Help Direct Organization's Future

By Mike Spofford

As the Green Bay Packers face the challenge of remaining financially competitive in the NFL's ever-changing landscape, the franchise has two new, young vice presidents to help lead the way.

But the ages of vice president of administration Jason Wied, 35, and vice president of finance Vicki Vannieuwenhoven, 40, should not be mistaken for any naivete with regards to the Packers' unique place in professional sports and the franchise's strong connection to its community and fans.

Not only have both Wied and Vannieuwenhoven, named to their new leadership posts this past spring, worked nearly a combined two decades for the Packers, but as northeast Wisconsin natives their affinity for and understanding of everything the Packers mean dates back much farther than that.

Wied, who is also the organization's corporate counsel, grew up within walking distance of Lambeau Field and went to elementary school just blocks from the stadium.

Whether it was getting players to ride his bike from the locker room to the practice field during training camp, chasing them down for autographs in his spiral notebook, or playing neighborhood football and basketball games with the likes of future Hall of Famer James Lofton or star running back Eddie Lee Ivery, Wied was living and learning the Packers mystique from a young age, and it's never left him.

"As kids, we lived and died with the Packers," Wied said. "I knew every single person on the team, where they went to college.

"You felt very connected. There really is a unique connection when you live in a small town, because we saw the guys around. If you saw them driving down the street, you knew it was a Packer player."

Vannieuwenhoven, the first female vice president in the history of the franchise, always knew there was something special about the Packers, too.

That's why, when she first got her hands on tickets as a college student at nearby St. Norbert College in De Pere, Wis., she wasn't going to miss the chance to see a game -- even if it meant riding through a blizzard with friends from her hometown of Crivitz, a 50-mile journey that included a fortunately harmless 360-degree spin at the top of a hill on a slippery Highway 41.

That game, on Dec. 1, 1985, turned out to be the famous "Snow Bowl" against Tampa Bay. Upon finally arriving at Lambeau Field that day, she remembers trudging through what seemed like waist-deep snow just to get in, and then moving down to the front row of the sparsely populated snowbank of bleachers.

"It was my first chance to actually go to a Packers game," said Vannieuwenhoven, explaining why she was one of the 19,856 who braved the weather to attend that day. "I always knew people that had tickets, but never well enough that I would get any. And I always babysat for families where every Packers game I'd watch their kids, but I never actually got to go myself.

"So I knew it was a novelty, and you didn't pass up the opportunity when you had it."

Neither passed up the opportunity to work for the Packers when it came along, either.

As a third-year law associate at a local firm, Wied had been called on to represent receiver Antonio Freeman in a traffic incident, and the relationships he developed led to an invitation to apply when the corporate counsel position opened seven years ago.

Vannieuwenhoven built familiarity with the Packers and the NFL while working for a local accounting firm, auditing reports or projects at Lambeau Field a few times per year before becoming one of two accountants for the Packers in 1995.

Neither ever envisioned rising to the positions they hold now, but their experience with the organization and knowledge of league workings have allowed for a comfortable transition to the added leadership responsibilities.

Supporting a staff who both trust and speak highly of, they'll be asked to help lead the Packers through an era that will include other new stadiums opening around the league and a possible opening of collective bargaining discussions with the players' union.

Closer to home, Wied and Vannieuwenhoven both stressed that enhancing the gameday experience at Lambeau Field continues to be a high priority at various levels throughout the organization.

"It's crucial we do that because it's those fans that keep us in the league, really," Vannieuwenhoven said. "I just attended a league meeting, and there are a number of teams that are not sold out, and they're trying to think of ways just to get people in the seats.

"We're fortunate we're not in that position, but at the same time we're so grateful and loyal to our fans. We've always put a large focus on keeping things fresh."

Fresh ideas to maximize revenue-generating opportunities with the renovated Lambeau Field and five-story Atrium, now a four-year-old venue, are getting increased focus as well.

"From a sales and marketing standpoint, we need to leverage this building as best we can," Wied said. "We promised the taxpayers when they helped support this stadium that if they built this, we would increase our revenues and remain competitive and viable in this league for another generation.

"That takes constant work and attention by our entire sales and marketing staff, and they need to be innovative, because the honeymoon period for the stadium is over."

> "SO MUCH OF WHAT WE HAVE HERE AND WHY WE'RE SUCCESSFUL – WHY PLAYERS ARE HONORED TO PLAY HERE AND COACHES ARE HONORED TO COACH HERE AND EMPLOYEES ARE HONORED TO WORK HERE – IS THE TRADITION PIECE."
> - Vicki Vannieuwenhoven

Innovations apply to connecting with the next generation of Packers fans as well. While the team does everything it can to continue the traditions Wied participated in as a Green Bay youngster, it can take more than that in the 21st century to establish the same type of bond with young fans.

"In the old days, you just needed to send the players out, shake hands with kids for a while, and the kids were connected to the team forever," Wied said. "I think now kids want something more. They want to be involved and have interactions with the club at a high-tech level.

"I ask my 9-year-old what he'd like, and he says he'd love a movie-size screen in the Atrium where you could play a John Madden football tournament. I'm not saying that's something we'd do or wouldn't do, but those are the kinds of things that grab kids."

At the same time, family-friendly events and time-honored activities such as stadium and Hall of Fame tours always will have their place, for young and old.

"So much of what we have here and why we're successful – why players are honored to play here and coaches are honored to coach here and employees are honored to work here – is the tradition piece," Vannieuwenhoven said. "We have a lot more tradition and history than a number of other teams, and we have to keep youth educated about our history and traditions, so that as time goes on that's not lost."

It can be a delicate balance between utilizing new technology and maintaining recognition of what makes the Packers different. That's just part of the challenge the new generation of leaders, like Wied and Vannieuwenhoven, will face now and in the coming years.

To be sure, their deep-rooted connections to the franchise and the community, along with their work experience in the modern-day NFL, make them up to that challenge.

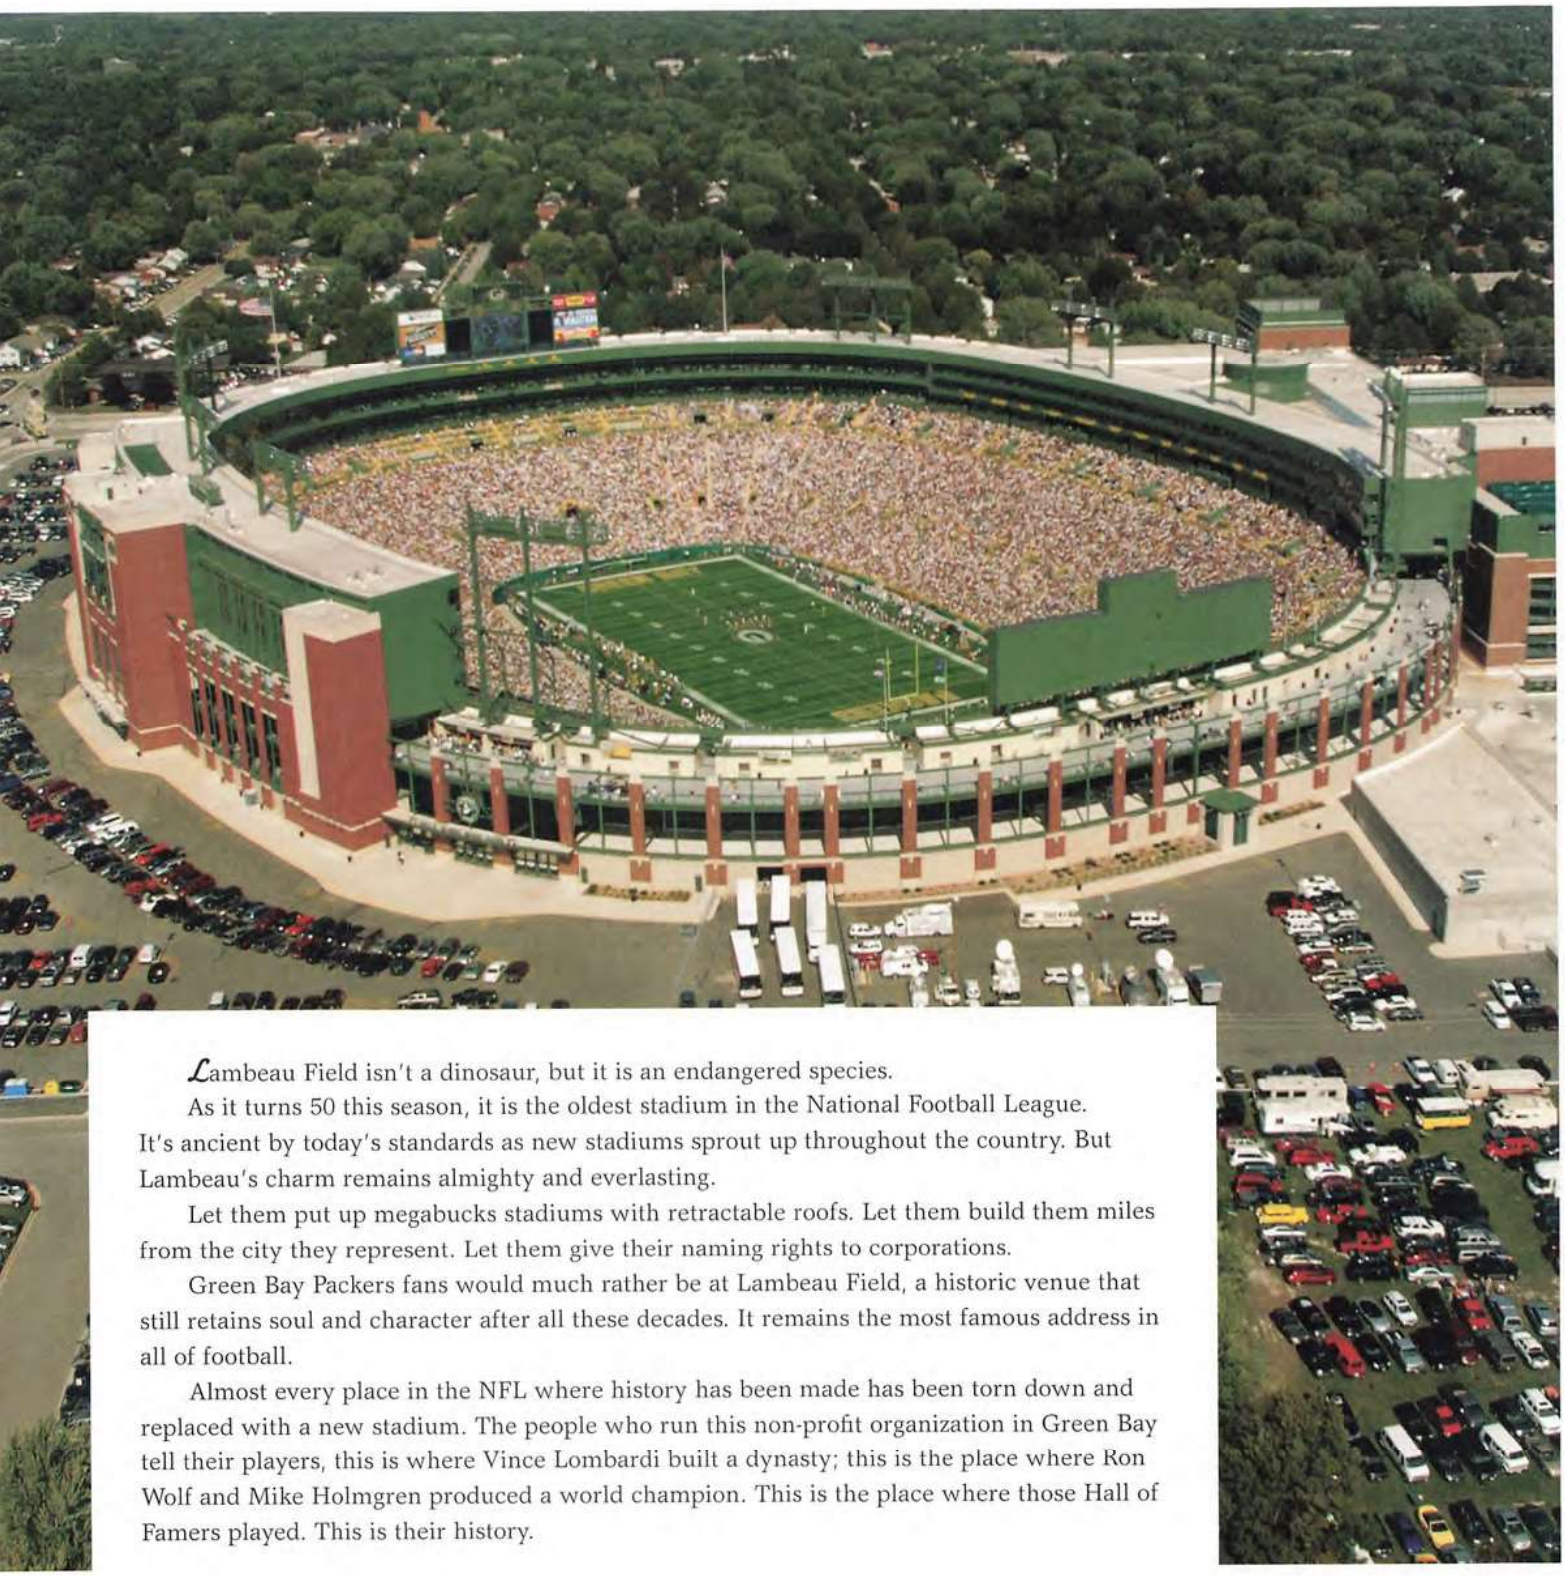
Lambeau Turns 50

Memories abound at NFL's most celebrated playing field

By Bud Lea - Packer Plus columnist



Lambeau Field isn't a dinosaur, but it is an endangered species.

As it turns 50 this season, it is the oldest stadium in the National Football League. It's ancient by today's standards as new stadiums sprout up throughout the country. But Lambeau's charm remains almighty and everlasting.

Let them put up megabucks stadiums with retractable roofs. Let them build them miles from the city they represent. Let them give their naming rights to corporations.

Green Bay Packers fans would much rather be at Lambeau Field, a historic venue that still retains soul and character after all these decades. It remains the most famous address in all of football.

Almost every place in the NFL where history has been made has been torn down and replaced with a new stadium. The people who run this non-profit organization in Green Bay tell their players, this is where Vince Lombardi built a dynasty; this is the place where Ron Wolf and Mike Holmgren produced a world champion. This is the place where those Hall of Famers played. This is their history.

They are right, of course.

After all these years, Lambeau Field is still home of the Packers. The team's colors are still green and gold and not some weird combination designed by the guy who dressed the Buffalo Bills. The team, as always, is owned by the fans. And people still stop in dead-drop awe when they walk into a place they call a shrine.

Fifty years have passed since that beautiful September afternoon when new City Stadium was dedicated. But Gary Knafelc can close his eyes today, return to 1957 and see the scene that would forever define the moment that saved the Green Bay Packers franchise.

"Oh, my goodness," Knafelc would say when the subject came up. "It was like night and day moving from that old wooden stadium to this brand new, concrete-bowl stadium. We all thought we finally had made the big time when we opened the season in our new stadium."

Knafelc, a big receiver from the University of Colorado, joined the Packers in 1954 after being released by the Chicago Cardinals. He couldn't believe what he saw at the old stadium on the east side of Green Bay when he walked into the place.

The locker room underneath the wooden stands was a dungeon. The team's equipment manager, Dad Braisher, used a regular wash tub and tubing to make a whirlpool bath. Players had wire-meshed stalls with a little board in front of them that they sat on. There was barely enough room to turn around.

"Conditions were terrible," Knafelc said. "Here I was with the Packers and in the NFL and I could only think that my high school team in Pueblo, Colo., had much better facilities. Was this the place the Packers called home?"

It was tougher on fans. There were those weather-beaten wooden planks that served as seats, and the lack of restrooms. Men felt free to relieve themselves under the rickety stands at halftime; women had to wait until they got home.

The footrests under the wooden benches consisted of two planks, and underneath the seating it was open to the ground. On frequent occasions, women accidentally dropped handbags and clothing down through the openings.

The Packers would station security guards under the stands and retrieve any dropped items and take them to the lost-and-found counter where they could be claimed.

There was always the thought that the place would collapse. Every year the Packers would inspect the underpinnings of the old stadium and would order replacements of the wooden members which supported the 23,500 seats.

The Packers had shared their home schedule with Milwaukee, playing games at Borchert Field, State Fair Park and Marquette Stadium. When County Stadium opened in 1953, the home of the Milwaukee Braves was quickly transformed into a very suitable site for football.

On Oct. 8, 1955, the Packers and the Baltimore Colts, both off to 2-0 starts, came to Milwaukee for an early-season showdown. The game was played on a Saturday night, and County Stadium sparkled like a jewel.

The Colts brought something else with them – their top draft choice, Alan Ameche, the Heisman Trophy winner from the University of Wisconsin. The attraction was big enough to lure 40,199 fans to County Stadium. At the time, it was the largest crowd ever to see a pro football game in Wisconsin.

Lambeau Field - 1998

Other opponents soon requested that the Packers start booking their games in Milwaukee instead of Green Bay, and Packers officials knew they no longer could stay in business playing games at old City Stadium.

George Halas, owner and coach of the Chicago Bears, bluntly told Green Bay fans that the only way they could compete in the NFL was to build a new stadium.

This necessitated a city referendum and funds to build a new City Stadium on the west side of Green Bay at a total cost of $960,000. Green Bay voters overwhelmingly approved the referendum by the count of more than two to one.

New City Stadium made its official opening on Sept. 29, 1957, when the Packers met their long-time rivals, the Bears. The sellout crowd of 32,132 was in a collective stupor for an early part of the game.

They got goose bumps just walking into the new stadium. They sat in open-mouthed silence, thinking they had gone to football heaven. Who could blame them?

It was all new to them: Seats close to the field. Plenty of parking. And best of all, restrooms.

So improved was Green Bay's stadium that Vice

Vice President Richard Nixon speaks at City Stadium's dedication in 1957.

President Richard Nixon, NFL Commissioner Bert Bell, George Halas and new Miss America, Marilyn Van Derbur, attended the dedication ceremonies.

Nixon spoke from a flag-decked dais on the 50-yard line during halftime ceremonies. The vice president said it was refreshing to find a city that didn't seek financial aid from Washington for construction costs.

Bell praised the smallest city in the NFL for getting the job done. "Here's a new stadium built by a city of 60,000 while big cities of 2 or 3 million argue about it," he said as fans cheered.

Halas recalled the days when the Bears and the Packers played at old Hagemeister Park with its wooden stands and two ticket booths. "You grew up together with the NFL," he said. "We of the Bears congratulate you." Papa Bear was cheered for the first time in Packerland.

Curly Lambeau, who organized the Packers in 1919 and coached them to six world championships, couldn't make it. But former Green Bay mayor Dominic Olejniczak read a wire from Lambeau. The telegram said: "The biggest little town in football is the only representative in the big leagues with a modern plant just for football. Long live the Packers."

This was the dawn of the modern NFL, and it was a lot of fun.

Green Bay fans got their money's worth that day. Make that double their money's worth.

When it was all said and done, the underdog Packers rallied in the fourth quarter and undressed the Bears, 21-17. Babe Parilli replaced a young Bart Starr at quarterback and completed 9 of 17 passes for 197 yards and two touchdowns – 37 yards to Billy Howton in the second quarter and six yards to Knafelc for the winning score with 8 minutes and 21 seconds to play.

No words were left to the Bears' imagination that was full of words before this first trip to Green Bay's new City Stadium with its sudden big-league atmosphere. What was there to say?

This is Green Bay?

It was hoped the new stadium could elevate the Packers' play and carry them for a while. But Lisle Blackbourn's 1957 team finished 3-9. After a 2-3 preseason record in 1958, Scooter McLean bravely proclaimed, "We're not just shooting for a good season. We're shooting for the championship."

On a late October Sunday when the going was tough, McLean looked skyward and prayed, "Please Lord, not this time." The Packers held on for dear life and escaped with a 38-35 home victory over the Philadelphia Eagles.

It was McLean's only win of the season as he compiled the worst record in team history, 1-10-1, a mark that New York sportswriter Red Smith, who had grown up in Green Bay, later immortalized with the phrase, "The Packers underwhelmed 10 opponents, overwhelmed one, and whelmed one."

Before the start of the 1959 season, most pro football experts picked the Packers to remain in the cellar of the NFL's Western Conference. I didn't know Vince Lombardi from Oscar Mayer when he came to Green Bay in 1959. Lombardi had toiled anonymously for 20 years when at age 46 he was finally hired to coach the hapless Packers. Bellowing on the sidelines, this man of granite who said "winning isn't everything ... it's the only thing," led them in the most storied period in NFL history, winning five world championships in nine seasons.

Loserville became Titletown. City Stadium was later renamed Lambeau Field.

Oh, what memories.

This is where Paul Hornung scored 33 points to lead the Packers to a 45-7 shellacking of the Baltimore Colts in 1961. He scored four touchdowns, six extra points, and one field goal. It still stands in the Packers' record book for the most points in one game.

Eleven weeks later, Hornung, along with Ray Nitschke and Boyd Dowler, got a Christmas furlough from military service and led the Packers to a 37-0 rout of the New York Giants for the 1961 NFL championship. Hornung ran for 89 yards and scored 19 points with only five days of practice. He was selected the game's outstanding player.

This is where the Packers beat the Cleveland Browns, 23-12, for the championship on a field turned into a quagmire on Jan. 2, 1966. Nitschke led the defense that stopped the heralded Jimmy Brown cold.

THE HALLOWED "ICE BOWL" IS TURNING 40

By Lee Remmel - Green Bay Packers Team Historian

Four decades after its frigid emergence on the national sports scene, it remains the most celebrated game in Packers history...and well it should.

What transpired in Lambeau Field on New Year's Eve afternoon in 1967 is the stuff that legends are made of.

It was, first and foremost, the coldest air temperature game in the annals of professional football (13 degrees below zero, with a wind chill of minus-46 degrees, at kickoff).

Officially, the benumbed capacity crowd numbered 50,965. Since that day, however, no fewer than 150,000 fans claim to have been in the stands for the historic showdown.

And, poetically, the tightfisted struggle between the Packers and the visiting Dallas Cowboys was climaxed by Bart Starr's classic quarterback sneak – a 1-yard "wedge" into the south end zone for the winning touchdown with only 13 seconds left in regulation, dramatically closing out one of the most gripping gridiron duels of all time, 21-17.

Duly affirmed in two separate polls, the – "Ice Bowl" – twice has been voted the greatest game in the Packers' 86-year National Football League history, a parlay which speaks eloquently for itself.

Meanwhile, some memorable scenes that could only have come on such an Arctic afternoon are triggered by recall of the numbing conditions.

Chief among them, throughout the afternoon, was the sight of a press box custodian tiptoeing back and forth along the counter in front of the working media to repeatedly squeegee heavy condensation off the press box windows so that the scribes could see the field, especially as dusk began to descend upon "Lambeau."

In the frigid aftermath, it remained for broadcaster Frank Gifford – then a CBS-TV "voice" after a Hall of Fame career on the football field – to provide an appropriate postscript to the unique proceedings.

He was taking obvious delight in relating one of his difficulties with the weather.

Gifford said he had, at one point during the telecast, acquired a cup of hot coffee.

He subsequently had set it down while continuing to carry out his professional duties in the CBS booth.

When he turned around to retrieve the coffee, he said, he made a surprising discovery.

"It," he said, "was frozen solid."

This is where the Packers and the Dallas Cowboys played a game in 13-below-zero weather on blood and guts and trench warfare and frostbite with the Packers driving 68 yards on the Frozen Tundra and winning on Starr's 1-yard sneak with 13 seconds left. It is the masterpiece simply referred to as The Ice Bowl.

It was the coldest New Year's Eve in Green Bay's cold history. Ray Nitschke suffered severe frostbite, as did several of his teammates. Lombardi said only the Cowboys got frostbite.

"Nitschke just had a blister," Lombardi said. "Only a blister. That's all it was. A blister."

The game became a legend of the city and the team.

This is where the Packers dynasty came to an end as Phil Bengtson's 1968 team lost to the Colts, 16-3, to finish 6-7-1. It was the Packers' first losing season since 1958, the year before Lombardi took the reigns. The band played "Auld Lange Syne" and a sellout crowd of 50,861 stood and cheered in a grateful ovation that lasted for the many wins and thrills the team had provided.

This writer will never forget what happened after beleaguered coach Bart Starr's team humiliated the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, 55-14, in 1983. In his post-game press conference, Bucs coach John McKay threatened me for asking him why his team had played so poorly. "Get the hell away from me before I punch you in the mouth," McKay told me. The next day I was big news in the Florida papers.

This is where Lynn Dickey completed 22 of 31 passes for 387 yards and three touchdowns and Jan Stenerud kicked the winning field goal from 20 yards with 54 seconds remaining as the Packers beat the Washington Redskins, 48-47, in the highest-scoring Monday Night Football game ever.

This is where Don Majkowski injured his ankle and had to leave the game, and a young quarterback named Brett Favre entered. "I was shaking," the untested Mississippi native said. "I felt like I took a laxative. Thank God I held it until the end."

With 13 seconds remaining at the Cincinnati Bengals' 35 and trailing 23-17, Favre fired a bullet to Kitrick Taylor into the right corner of the end zone and the Packers leaped into the Holmgren era with a 24-23 victory.

This is where Green Bay became Titletown again when Mike Holmgren's team overpowered the upstart Carolina Panthers, 30-13, in the NFC Championship Game on Jan. 12, 1997. Under Holmgren, the Packers knew they could step on their Lambeau Field turf and know deep in their souls that they would not, could not be beaten in their house.

Lambeau Field comes equipped with memories. There's the south end zone where Starr sneaked in for the winning touchdown in the Ice Bowl. There's the visiting bench where Mike Ditka blew a gasket after instant replay officials ruled Majkowski had not stepped over the line of scrimmage after firing the winning touchdown pass to Sterling Sharpe to beat the Bears, 14-13, in 1989. This is the spot where Dan Devine broke his leg in the first game in 1971. There are the Lambeau Leaps, where Green Bay touchdown heroes jump into the stands. This is where Antonio Freeman made a juggling catch on his back, then got up and ran into the end zone for a 43-yard touchdown in overtime as the Packers stunned the Minnesota Vikings, 26-20, in 2000.

Packers fans love that stuff.

Bob Harlan, then club president, said it was his duty to preserve a national treasure when he went to Brown County taxpayers and begged them to vote for a referendum to improve Lambeau Field to the tune of $295 million in 2000.

Some Green Bay residents resented being taxed for a football stadium, and the Packers took some hard hits. In the end, the referendum passed by a 53-47 percentage.

Was Lambeau Field worth saving? Well, is Wrigley Field? Fenway Park?

The 32-month renovation project achieved the stated goal of blending the old with the new, and today, Green Bay has the only retro-look stadium in the NFL. Not only was the seating bowl - the heart of the stadium itself - saved, stadium capacity increased from 60,890 to 72,928.

The refurbished stadium was dedicated Sept. 7, 2003, and it has turned into a gold mine for the Packers with its five-story Atrium, Pro Shop, Hall of Fame, restaurants, and year-round special events.

Lambeau Field, 50 going on 20, still is the coolest stadium in the land. Just ask any of the now nearly 73,000 who pack the place for every game and any of the 74,000 who have put their name on a season-ticket waiting list, praying for their lucky day to arrive.

A Green & Gold Makeover

Lambeau Field's New Playing Surface a Natural Fit

By Nathan Hager

The historic Lambeau Field, one of the most hallowed grounds in all of sports, is literally never going to be the same.

And that's not necessarily a bad thing.

Oh, the Green Bay Packers will still play in front of almost 73,000 screaming fans in their home stadium, and the venue will undoubtedly be one of the most exciting places to be on Sundays, but a new playing surface marks one major change for the 2007 season and beyond.

In efforts to improve footing, drainage, and overall performance, the organization completed an off-season task to eliminate the clay-based surface in favor of one that combines DD Grassmaster, a natural grass surface, with man-made fibers developed by Desso DLW Sports Systems.

Still, noticeable or not, the biggest advantage the new turf will provide is better safety.

The idea of keeping "real grass" while also being able to reinforce it more effectively with synthetic fibers gives this surface the best of both worlds according to the team's field manager, Allen Johnson.

"It gives you more consistency from the synthetic component," Johnson said. "One of the big pluses about the artificial surfaces is they're more consistent in all types of weather. But at the same time, if you want more natural grass you can have that too, because this system allows that."

The consistent footing that Johnson refers to is made possible by the sand-based soil that is reinforced by synthetic stitching. Though this stitching won't take the place of grass or make it wear out any less, Johnson said its purpose is to hold the sod from tearing from the surface.

Long story short, the ground will be more durable when the harsh conditions of November and December set in. Of course, this also means there won't be any need to re-sod late in the regular season or even in the off-season as the team has done regularly in the past, and that is quite alright with Johnson.

"Re-sodding used to make a whole new part of the field," Johnson said. "There was 100-percent turf cover again and the players liked that. But we didn't usually re-sod the outer areas and some of those side areas started to give in and actually became a little loose.

"The difference is now late in the season the players will probably see the middle more worn and they might see the field more worn, but they won't see it give. There won't be chunks of sod coming undone and the footing will be more secure."

Johnson, who is entering his 11th season with the Packers, speaks with first-hand knowledge on the turf surface because the team installed it on Clarke Hinkle Field prior to the 2005 training camp. Aside from it holding up well on that field, Johnson said it's also helpful that the players have liked practicing on it and it's not entirely new to the NFL. The Denver Broncos, Philadelphia Eagles and Pittsburgh Steelers all employ the same surface.

It's clear that both Johnson and the Packers have done plenty of research and after careful consideration have decided that this new technological advance in turf surface will be a good fit for Lambeau Field.

"When we put it on our practice field I went over to the Netherlands to investigate it because although Denver already had it in the NFL, I wanted to see something that had it in longer," Johnson explained. "At the time, it was on a soccer practice field over there for 10 or 12 years. Then we went to three or four old stadiums they had it on. It held up well in all of them."

Though the new system will undoubtedly be more stable than the old one, that doesn't mean there isn't going to be maintenance involved with it, however. Surface management is going to be vital, which means more thatching for Johnson and his crew. How often the field needs to be re-seeded is still up in the air, but that's a routine procedure anyway, according to Johnson.

"Some of the teams have been doing it every two or three years and some are doing it every year," Johnson said. "It's kind of wait-and-see. The Clarke Hinkle Field has seen two seasons and this fall we're going to do that maintenance practice.

"We're going to take our machine and basically mill off the top quarter to half inch to get all that thatch out of there. You may not have any natural grass there, but you'll have all the fibers there and the straight sand and then we'll seed that this fall."

The irony in all of this is that for such a drastic improvement to the surface, it will hardly be noticeable to the average fan. The grass is still going to be green, natural, and a significant part of Lambeau Field. Yet, the most visual difference probably will be in the lack of crown on the field.

Johnson said that this is made possible by the new sand base and the synthetic fibers, which are anchored nearly eight inches below the ground. These changes will improve the drainage, which will now come internally and in turn eliminate the need for a crown. Johnson estimates that the middle of the field was reduced from 14 inches to 5.5 inches.

"When we had the opportunity, we wanted to make it flatter because the players prefer a flatter field," Johnson explained. "It just works where we don't need that crown anymore."

Still, noticeable or not, the biggest advantage the new turf will provide is better safety, something Johnson says the team rates No. 1 in terms of importance followed by performance and then aesthetics.

Now, Johnson can breathe just a little bit easier. Gone are the two biggest late-season fears he had.

"I was always worried in December or January games that someone would be running near the sidelines, make a big cutback to dodge a player and the sod was going to give," Johnson explained. "Then you'd have a huge mound of sod come out, a player could get hurt, or even if he didn't get hurt, it most likely would have affected the play. It could have been a game-winning touchdown and the sod would have affected the game.

"The other fear was that when we re-sodded late in the season down the middle of the field, we used a clay based Bermuda sod and if we had gotten a torrential downpour it would have been a muddy mess in the middle. Then we would have had another 'Mudbowl' and that wouldn't have been good, either."

Johnson said the team has received a lot of positive feedback regarding the project and understandably so. With better safety, more stability, sound heating, better drainage, and the ability to keep a natural surface, what's not to like?

According to Johnson, there's not much anxiety or nervousness on his end because he's seen how Clarke Hinkle Field has held up and a better field is only going to benefit the players in the long run and that's what it's all about.

"We're trying to keep up with technology and having a safe field is basically insurance for your players," Johnson said. "You have millions of dollars put into these players. It's a huge investment and when they play on your field, you want it as safe as possible. We're trying to get the safety and consistency the best we can and still keep it natural."

The new surface is undoubtedly a new phenomenon of sorts, but perhaps the real story here is that Lambeau Field, already known as one of the most legendary venues in the NFL, has just become even better.

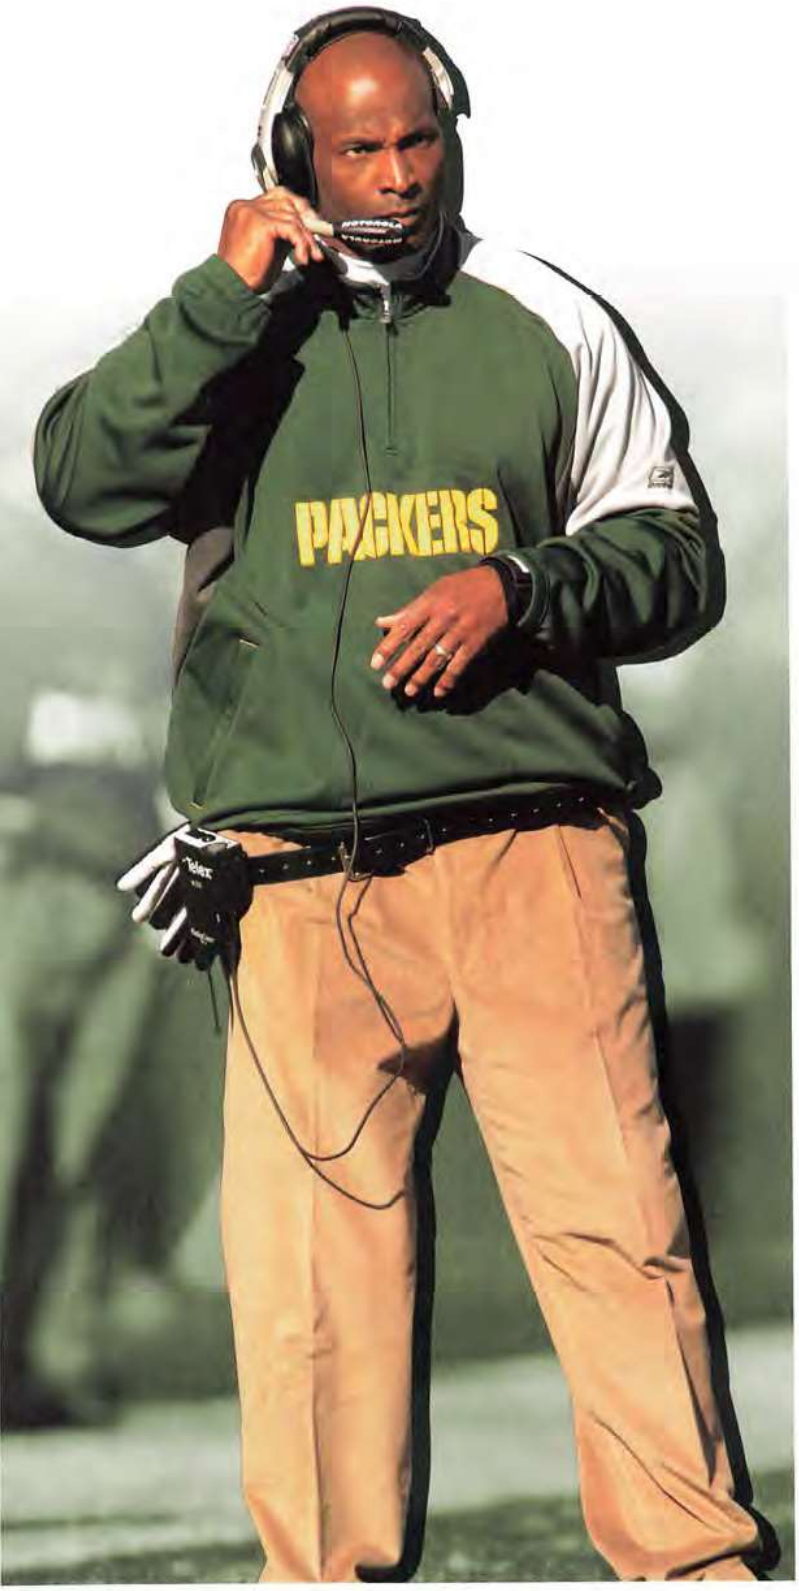
Winston Moss

Assistant Head Coach is McCarthy's Right-Hand Man

By Rob Demovsky - Green Bay Press-Gazette



To understand Winston Moss' new position with the Green Bay Packers, it is first necessary to appreciate just what the former National Football League linebacker went through to get into coaching in the first place.

Then - and only then - does it make it clear just how far Moss has come and exactly how close he is to reaching the pinnacle of the coaching profession. Packers head coach Mike McCarthy on Jan. 15, 2007, promoted Moss to assistant head coach, making him second in command to only McCarthy himself. These days in the NFL, assistant head coaches often ride the fast track to a head-coaching job.

"Absolutely, that's an aspiration of mine," Moss said. "That goal is down the road. The short-term, immediate goal is winning a championship with the Packers. When that happens, everything takes care of itself."

The 41-year-old Moss first began to think of himself as coach in 1995, when he arrived in Seattle after splitting the first eight years of his playing career in Tampa Bay and Oakland.

"When I got to Seattle, I asked the coaching staff there, it was coach (Dennis) Erickson, if this was my last stop, would they consider me for coaching after that," Moss said. "They agreed, and it just so happened that three years down the road, I had a career-ending injury."

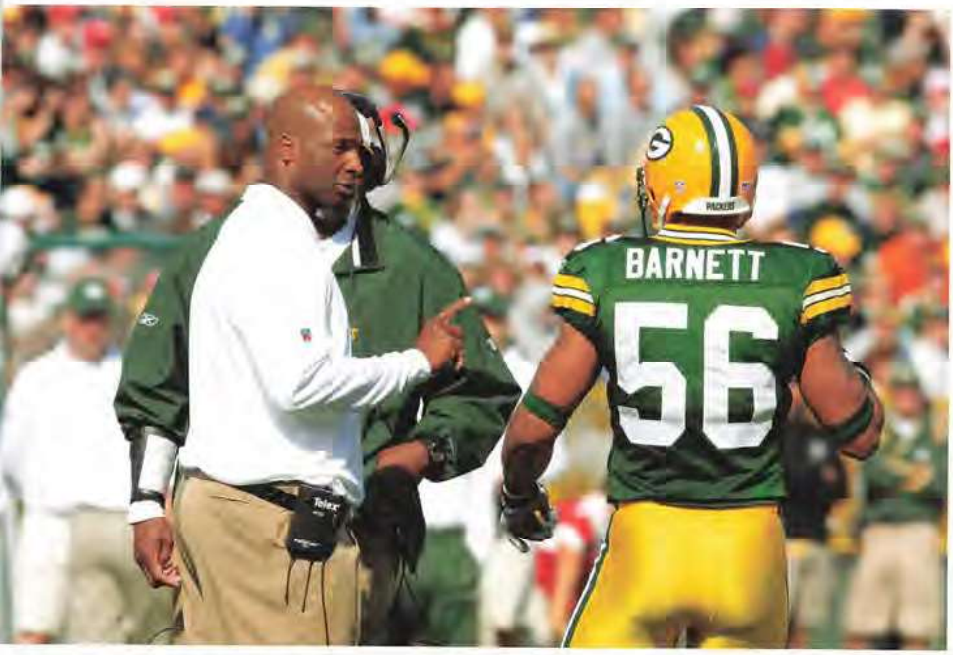
Moss can talk now about his injury in a matter-of-fact manner, but on that mid-December day in 1997, when he lay motionless on the field in Baltimore, no one would have blamed Moss for walking away from football altogether, as either a player or a coach.

On the first play of the game, Moss and fellow Seahawks linebacker Chad Brown were pursuing a play. Moss came from the right side and Brown from the left. Moss was about to drill the ball carrier. He leaned forward, sticking his head out, and before he made the tackle, someone hit him on his left side. It was Brown, who unknowingly had broken Moss' neck.

"I had never even had a stinger before," Moss said. "All of a sudden I didn't have any feeling going down my shoulder."

Doctors determined that Moss had broken the C-5 vertebra in his neck, and the best course of action would be to wear a restrictive halo - the kind that was screwed into Moss' head and neck - for three months.

"It was pretty grim," Moss said. "At first, playing again



On that mid-December day in 1997, when he lay motionless on the field in Baltimore, no one would have blamed Moss for walking away from football altogether, as either a player or a coach.

was not in the discussion with the doctors. Still, in the back of my mind, I thought I could make a comeback. But I remember the day vividly in the doctor's office after three months with the halo. It was the day they took it off. It took awhile to unscrew everything, and I'll never forget the sensation I felt – the lightheadedness, the atrophy of the muscles – I knew right then and there it was a done deal. The game was over."

Moss knew he was lucky to walk away – literally – from football. No one would have blamed him had he decided to leave the game behind completely. Instead, he went back to the Seahawks' coaches and asked them if they remembered his request three years earlier.

"Coincidentally, they had a defensive quality control position available," Moss said. "They transitioned me right into coaching. I was absolutely blessed because a lot of players have struggled making the transition, but I don't think I could have done it any smoother. I mean, you never want to break your neck to move onto your next phase, but ..."

Coaching linebackers seemed like a natural for Moss, who started 146 NFL games at the position. The Seahawks' linebackers coach at the time was none other than Jim Johnson, a brilliant coaching mind who now is one of the top defensive coordinators in the league with the Philadelphia Eagles.

"He did a tremendous job of helping me learn how to coach linebackers," Moss said. "It was a great experience."

Two years later, Moss met McCarthy when both were on the New Orleans Saints coaching staff. Though they worked on opposite sides of the ball, a mutual respect quickly developed between the two – so much so that when McCarthy became head coach of the Packers in 2005, the first defensive coach he hired was Moss. And when McCarthy lost his right-hand man, offensive coordinator Jeff Jagodzinski to Boston College shortly after the 2005 season, he tabbed Moss as his assistant head coach.

In his new role, Moss will continue to coach linebackers, but he will fulfill the role of confidant that Jagodzinski played so well last season.

"Winston is an integral part of our coaching staff as the team grows and moves forward," McCarthy said. "His responsibilities are clear – he is my right-hand man when it comes to all team decisions. He has earned an expansion of his duties.

"I've had the opportunity to watch Winston grow as a coach since we worked together in New Orleans. I believe that he has a very bright future in this league and will be a great asset to our team."

Moss' new role will develop over time, but it already has shown up in important ways. During the minicamp practices, Moss gathered the team together after stretching and gave the pre-practice speech, something McCarthy had done in the past. It was the first indication that McCarthy was giving Moss more responsibility.

Moss' influence on the linebackers last season was noticeable. He helped first-round draft pick A.J. Hawk make a successful and smooth transition to the NFL. He guided Nick Barnett to perhaps his best season in the NFL, and he oversaw major improvement by Brady Poppinga, who was a first-year starter.

Hawk sees no reason why Moss' influence won't continue and become more widespread given his new role.

"Winston Moss helped me so much in terms of getting me ready for the NFL," Hawk said, "and it just shows how much coach McCarthy thinks of him, giving him this new job."

Joe Philbin

Veteran Coach Makes Ascent to Offensive Coordinator

By Dylan B. Tomlinson

It was Jan. 12, 2006, when Joe Philbin read the news across the crawl on his television set.

Philbin saw that the Green Bay Packers had hired Mike McCarthy as their head football coach.

At the time, Philbin, who had been the assistant offensive line and tight ends coach, didn't see the announcement as good news.

"My first reaction was that this was it for me in Green Bay," Philbin said. "I know how this deal works. I'd been in situations before when one coach is fired and another is brought in. New coaches like to bring in their own staffs."

For the most part, Philbin was right. The next day several Packers assistants, including the bulk of the offensive staff were let go. Among those jettisoned was Packers offensive line coach Larry Beightol. As Beightol was being shown the door, he gave Philbin a strong recommendation.

Apparently, Philbin had made quite the impression on Packers general manager Ted Thompson as well. Thompson also asked McCarthy to consider keeping Philbin.

"I never asked them to do that, but it shows what kind of people Larry and Ted are that they would speak up for me like that," Philbin said. "It really meant a lot to me."

McCarthy retained just six coaches from Mike Sherman's staff. But not only was Philbin kept on staff, he was the only coach held over from Sherman's staff who received a promotion.

"It was everything that I wanted," Philbin said. "I made it clear that I wanted to stay in Green Bay and I felt very fortunate to be able to do that."

It proved to be a great hire. Despite sometimes having as many as three rookies in the starting lineup, the Packers offensive line arguably made as much progress as any position during the 2006 season. Despite lacking experience, the Packers offensive line gave up only 24 sacks, the fifth fewest in the NFL. They also helped revive the Packers running game, which, despite having a rash of injuries, was able to still produce a 1,000-yard rusher in Ahman Green.

Philbin made enough of an impression on McCarthy during their first season together that when Jeff Jagodzinski left to become the head coach at Boston College, McCarthy tabbed Philbin as his new offensive coordinator.

"After having the chance to work with Joe this past year, I've been impressed with everything I've seen from him," McCarthy said. "Professionally, I'd classify him as a high character individual. Personally, I think he's an excellent fit for the direction that we're going with our offense."

With McCarthy's expertise in the passing game, Philbin said he understands that the bulk of his duties will involve the running game. "When you go from being the offensive line coach to being the coordinator, you expect that to be the case," Philbin said. "We'll be looking to complement each other and make the offense as good as we can."

For Philbin, running the Packers offense represents a meteoric rise through the NFL's coaching ranks after coaching collegetely from 1984-2002. After spending time at Tulane, Worcester Tech, U.S Merchant Marine Academy, Ohio, Northeastern, Harvard and Iowa, Philbin faced a difficult decision when he decided to come to the Packers before the 2003 season.

"It really was. The money was exactly the same and I was the part of an outstanding staff at Iowa," Philbin said.

"But I had always wanted to coach pro football. I wanted to coach in the NFL. It's all worked out very well, but at the time it was a difficult decision."

Philbin spent one season as the Packers' assistant offensive line coach. The following year, he continued in that role, but also coached the tight ends. But after one season under McCarthy, Philbin said he is excited about his new role as offensive coordinator.

Philbin said he doesn't anticipate making huge changes to the Packers offense, but said he's working with McCarthy to make sure the offense continues to improve.

"We're just building on some of the things we did last year," Philbin said. "There's always room for improvement and you always want to move forward, and that's what we're looking to do."

When asked where the Packers can improve the most on offense, Philbin doesn't hesitate.

"We need to hold on to the football better," Philbin said. "Unfortunately, one of the common themes of this team the last few years has been to put the ball on the ground and give the ball away. That's something we've been working to try to prevent this season."

As Philbin helps oversee the Packers rushing game, he will face the unenviable task of having to find a replacement for Green, a four-time Pro Bowler, who rushed for more than 1,000 yards in six of his seven seasons in Green Bay.

"Obviously Ahman is a fantastic player and his loss is something we'll have to deal with," Philbin said. "But his departure will create an opportunity for someone else. Before Ahman became a star here, he languished in Seattle, so some player is going to have the chance to do something similar here when they step in for Ahman."

After working so closely with the offensive line the past four seasons, Philbin admitted that it felt "a little different" to be overseeing the whole offense.

"When you're the position coach you spend so much time with those guys and you have such a strong relationship with those players. You know them so well on and off the field that it can be tough not to be around them as much as I was before," Philbin said. "Now, I just move around at practice a lot more. It takes some getting used to."

Philbin said the Packers' offensive linemen have been nothing but supportive about his move from assistant line coach to the offensive coordinator over the last two seasons.

"They've been great and I know they're really happy for me," Philbin said. "There's a lot of good-natured ribbing. I must admit, I enjoy every second of it."

"THERE'S ALWAYS ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT AND YOU ALWAYS WANT TO MOVE FORWARD AND THAT'S WHAT WE'RE LOOKING TO DO."

Since when does cruising have to be a cruise?

A cruiser is a cruiser, right? At Suzuki, we disagree. But so you don't have to take our word for it, we picked three friends, George, Tracy and Jeff, for the ride of a lifetime on Suzuki Boulevard cruisers from D.C. to Daytona. George's response to his first ride on the M109R: "The power is incredible!" He should know. He rides track days on a GSX-R1000. Jeff wired into other GSX-R influences right away: "What I find is a lot of the same stuff: radial-mounted brakes, inverted fork and fuel injection." Jeff feels the M109R delivers handling as impressive as its power: "The bike's awesome. It turns in pretty quick, especially with that wide 240 rear tire." With exceptional power, handling and braking, the M109R has all the ingredients needed to make it, in George's words, "...as bad as you want it to be." And middleweight riders take note: The M50 has all the style in a more compact package. Football Fun Continues for Favre

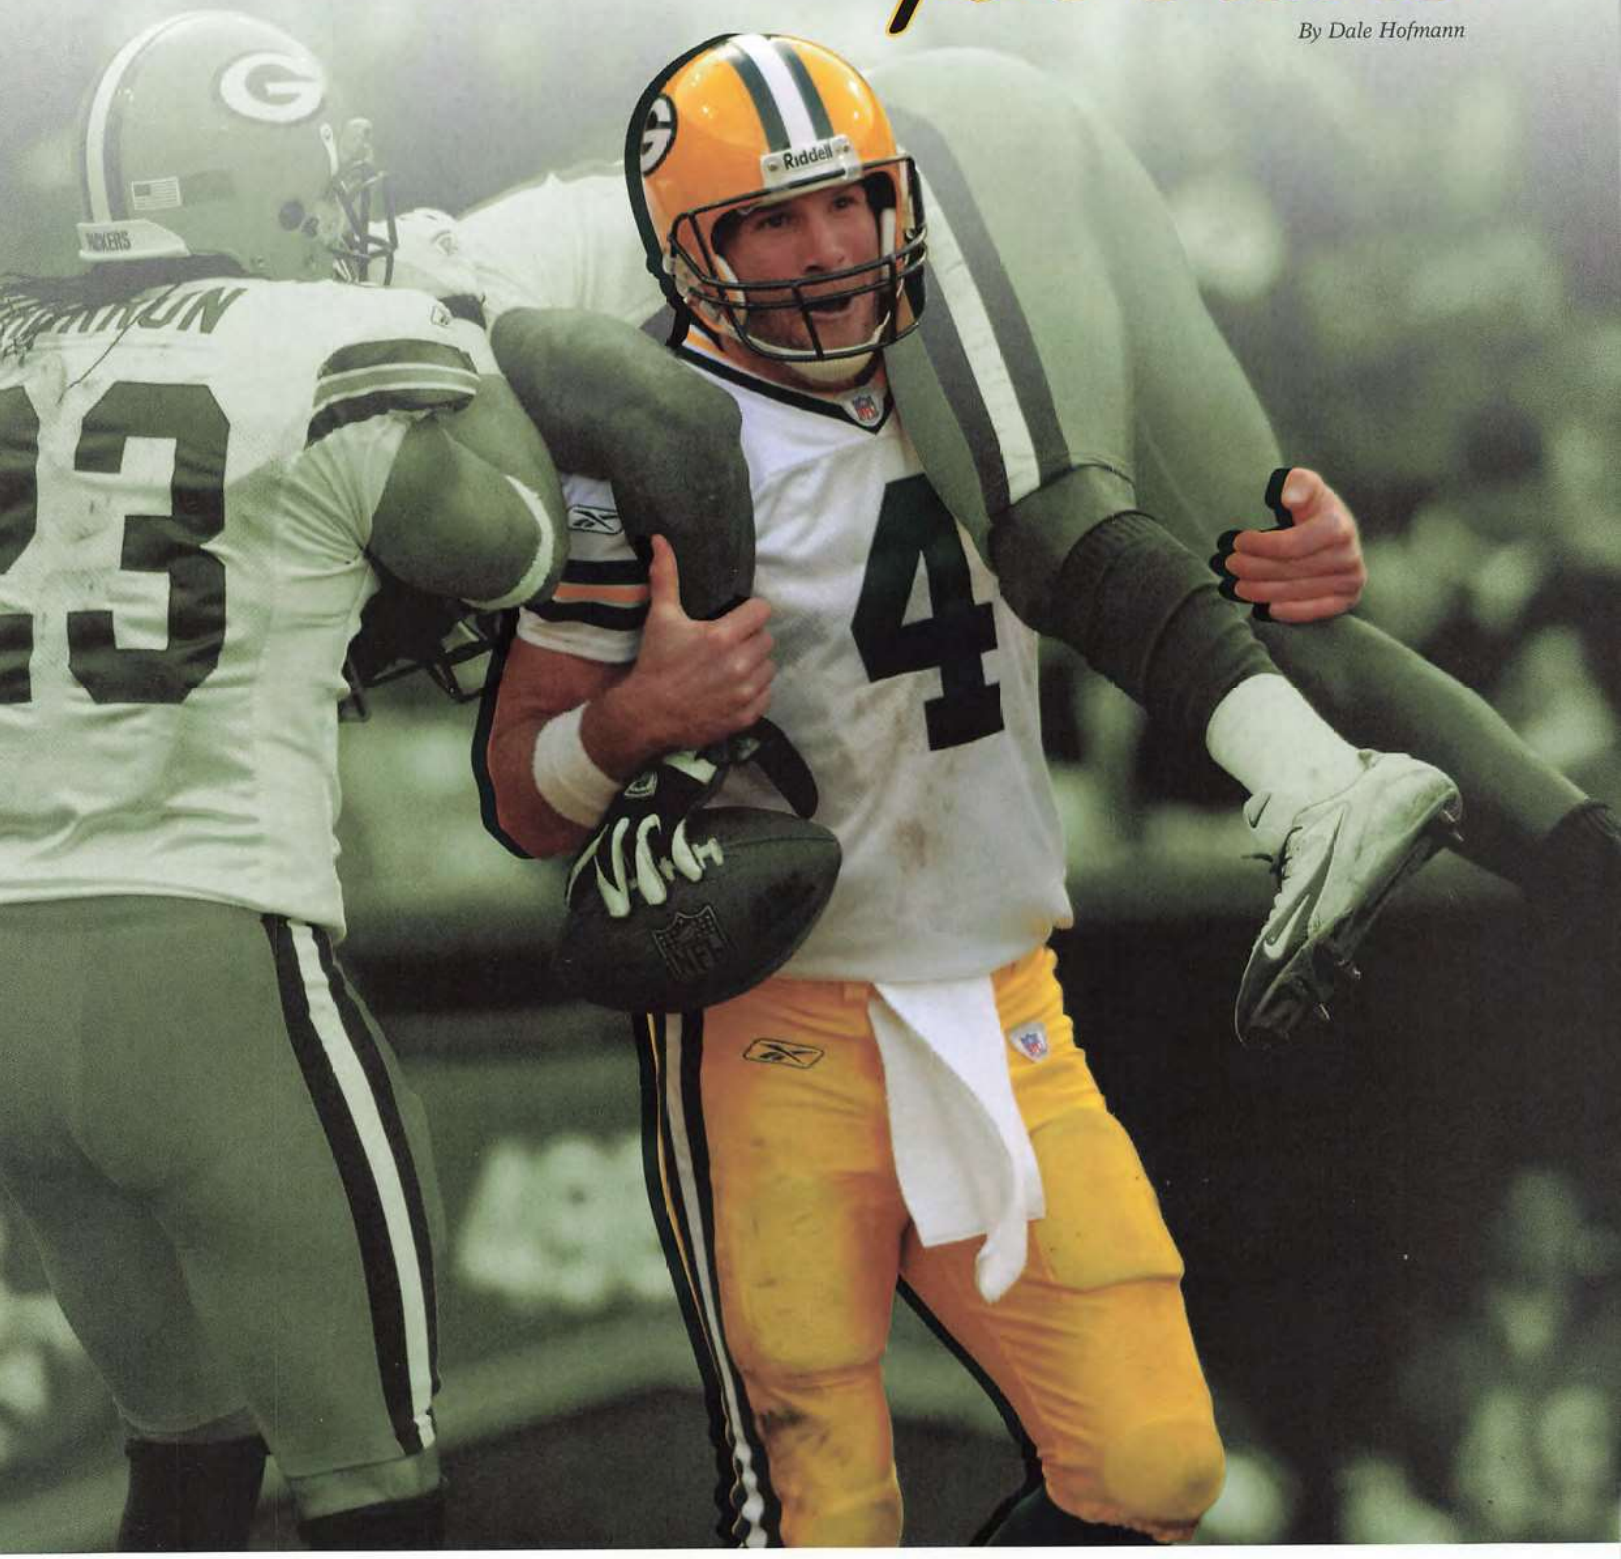
By Dale Hofmann



Seventeen seasons, or more than three average NFL lifetimes into an unforgettable career, Brett Favre doesn't think much about entering the Hall of Fame. He just knows where he'd like to be if it happens.

"It would be a tremendous honor to be voted in," he says,"but I'd rather do it via satellite or have them send me a jacket or whatever they do and just stay at home."

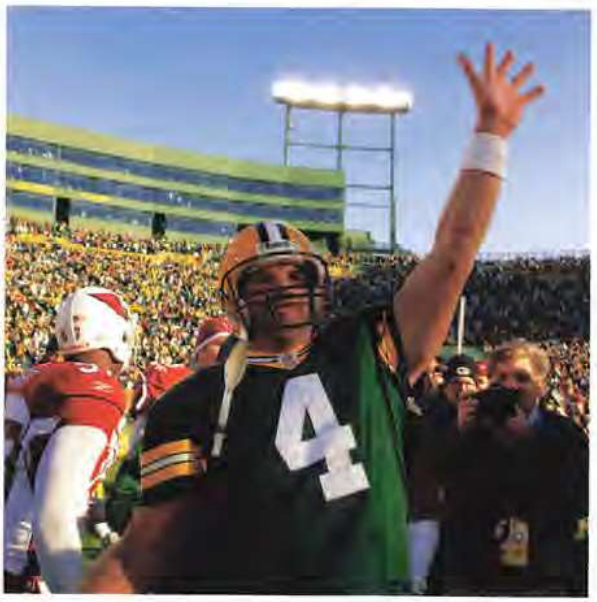
With Favre of course, it's long been a matter of when not whether, and the timing is pretty much up to him. He'll have to stop playing first, and he's enjoying himself too much to do that. But the fact that he'd prefer to skip the fuss says something about him that no one would have thought when he got to Green Bay.

It tells us that he's learned the difference between what he wants and what he needs, which is a pretty good working definition of a man at peace.

"A lot of people need some type of recognition at the end of their careers, kind of the icing on the cake," he explained. "But to me, the icing on the cake started from the first day I put a uniform on, and it's been more icing every game I've played. I truly treasure everything that's gone with it, but you can only play football for so long and people can only cheer for you for so long, and then what happens? "It's the stuff off the field that has to go on well after football."

Entire wars have been lost with less documentation than Favre's trials, ranging from his struggles with pain medications to hurricanes to family tragedies. There are people who believe he's handled those at least as well as anything he's handled on the field, and one of those people is Favre.

"No doubt about it," he said. "I think the people who have been around me the whole time would say that. There have been some inner struggles, some fights with myself and things our family has had to deal with, and being able to overcome them and come out a stronger person is something I admire myself for. We're all dealt different cards, and I've made a lot of mistakes and will continue to make them, but I think I'm in a much better place now.



Favre says he has yet to wake up in the morning wondering if he can still do the job well, and until that happens he's likely to stay around.

"I'm still as passionate about the game, and I like to think I'm as open and fun-loving a player as I always was. It just doesn't come as often. I find myself just getting through sometimes, but I try to make it fun for the other guys, and it also helps me.

"Once I quit drinking, which was about eight years ago, I found out that I wasn't quite as social or as outgoing as I thought I was. I didn't feel as comfortable in a crowd. It took me a while after I quit to find out what I really was. The first month, I was bored, but then I started to become more of a dad and more of a loner."

More of a gardener, too. Favre's affinity for his riding mower is legend now, and like most legends it's a little overblown. He admits he can get bored driving the thing, just as he used to get bored sometimes running the plays that Mike Holmgren sent in for him. When he improvised then, the results were usually more dramatic than they are when he's behind the wheel.

There's still not an ounce of complacency in 222 pounds of Favre, but he does recognize some value in predictability.

"We bought our property in 1996, and it was really one of the best things I could have done because it gave me a place to relax and do something constructive," he said. "I've had people ask me, 'You cut your own grass?' Well, yeah I do. It's therapeutic. You can get hurt doing anything, and you can get in trouble doing anything, but I'm at a place in my life where I really feel like I'm at peace."

It's true that you can get hurt anywhere, and when Favre goes to work he clearly faces greater occupational hazards than most. His record for durability is also legend, and that one's not overblown. Oddly enough, it's also why many of his most ardent fans would like to see him call it a career. They just don't want to see him get hurt. He appreciates the sentiment.

"Believe me, I don't want to either," he said. "You know you've been around a long time when people start saying that instead of 'Boy, I'd like him to be MVP again.' A lot of luck has been involved, but to me mental toughness is the best asset any player, or any person really, can have. Being able to overcome adversity is so important. I don't have any certain formula to do it. It was just the way I was raised.

"Regardless of what people might think, I've been booed in this stadium, and I've had (negative) things written about me, and how I deal with that is as important as how I deal with people cheering me and writing good things about me. The same goes for injury. I can't worry about it, and I don't."

Favre believes he's always had a thick skin when it comes to what's been written about him, but he'll admit to exceptions. One of the big ones came this past spring when the name Randy Moss was making local headlines and it was reported that Favre had asked to be traded.

"You can say what you want about the way I play," he said, "but what bothers me are untrue statements or assumptions that are just off-base. When people say Brett wanted to be traded because he doesn't like his teammates, which is totally untrue, that means more to me than anything.

"The last thing I want to do is ever ruffle feathers. Being a team player, being a good team leader has always been the most important thing to me, and I don't want that to change. I'm very thankful that I'm still the quarterback for the Packers, but I don't want to just be the quarterback. I want to be a force."

The question of how long he'll want that is one that even Favre can't answer. He says he has yet to wake up in the morning wondering if he can still do the job well, and until that happens he's likely to stay around. When he gave a tearful interview following last season's nationally televised finale in Chicago, most people were sure he was done.

"Everybody read that wrong," he said. "I never said it was my last game. But when I was asked the question, it kind of hit me that it might be, and I started looking back on all the games and all the guys. I know I was emotional, and yeah it would have been a great way to go out. But there are greater ways to go out, and regardless of how my last game ends, my career speaks for itself in my mind. I don't have to go out with a Super Bowl win."

Not that he'd mind. A Super Bowl would be the ultimate achievement for Favre this year, but he has a more modest goal. He wants to play every game, because if he doesn't it will mean that he's either playing badly or he's hurt.

It's not the money that's motivating him, because he has plenty of that, and it's not the records he's likely to break because he's sure those will just get broken again by somebody else. No, he's back for the simplest of reasons.

"The bottom line is I still love to play," he said. "For three hours on Sunday or Monday night or whatever it is, I still love that as much as anyone. That hasn't changed. In fact, it's probably gotten even greater, and that's why I deal with losses and a lack of success harder now. I don't want to bust my butt and lose every week or not be as proficient as I once was. I expect more out of myself every game.

"I really don't know how I'll look at my career when it's over, because I'm still playing. But I believe I've laid it all on the line, and I wouldn't trade my career for anything. There have been some ups and downs. It's just like life. You deal with it. I'm pretty content with that."

Aaron Kampman

REACHES NEW HEIGHTS IN BREAKING THROUGH FOR FIRST PRO BOWL SEASON

By Tim Froberg, The Appleton Post-Crescent

His play in his first five National Football League seasons was as solid as the hardwood planks he used to pile for his father at Kesley Lumber.

Bob Kampman's customers would buy those boards and use them to build something special.

Aaron Kampman did the same as a football player last season, taking a game he has been building since the day he arrived in Green Bay and putting it all together.

Solid, though, isn't a strong enough word to describe Kampman's performance in 2006. It was sublime.

In crashing through for his first Pro Bowl season, Kampman ratcheted his game to a new, dynamic level and became an impact defensive player.

The Packers' left defensive end finished second in the NFL in sacks with an NFC-high 15.5 - the third-most in Packer history. But Kampman was more than just a sack sensation.

His 113 tackles (84 solo) were the most by a defensive lineman in franchise history - breaking Ezra Johnson's previous record of 107 - and Kampman matched a career-high in forced fumbles (three).

In addition to his Pro Bowl selection, Kampman was chosen as the NFL Alumni Association's Pass Rusher of the Year and received All-NFC honors from Pro Football Weekly/ Pro Football Writers Association. He was a second-team All-Pro selection by the Associated Press and joined Reggie White as the only Packer to be named as NFL Defensive Player of the Week twice in a season.

"It's hard to get three sacks in a season - no less 15," said Packers defensive ends coach Carl Hairston. "He did a hell of a job in the run game, too.

"That's the kind of player you want on your defense, a guy who can excel against both the run and the pass. He had a great year."

And to think that Kampman entered the 2006 season labeled as a productive, but limited, overachiever who lacked explosiveness, athleticism and game-changing qualities. But Kampman crossed the line from effort to elite player and plans to stay at the latter level - even though he can live with the try-hard label.

"That [being questioned for his athleticism] is something I used to try and fight for, but it doesn't bother me one way or the other anymore," said Kampman. "I do try and work extremely hard, so that label has always been given to me, but that's OK."

Then again, if effort alone produced sacks, Notre Dame's Rudy Ruettiger would have been a first-round NFL draft pick in 1976.

"Believe me, it takes more than just trying hard to get to the quarterback," said Hairston. "Athletically, Aaron is a lot better than he's given credit for.

"And he's one of the best technicians I've ever coached. He plays with great leverage, so he's able to get underneath a guy. You combine that with the way he studies and puts in time after practice, that's why he's successful.

"He reminds me so much of Grant Wistrom, who I coached in St. Louis. They're identical players. They both have great technique and go so hard in practice that you worry about whether they'll have anything left on Sunday."

Kampman has gradually evolved as a player since the Packers invested a modest fifth-round draft pick in the University of Iowa product during the 2002 draft.

He had just a half-sack his rookie season when he made six starts, and two sacks in 10 starts during 2003. Kampman delivered 4.5 sacks in starting all 16 games during the 2004 season and hoisted his sack total to 6.5 (along with 105 tackles) in 2005.

When asked to explain the steady spike in his play, Kampman chalks it up to experience.

"I've always believed there are no magic potions or formulas," said Kampman. "I just think that the longer you play this game, the more you learn about the little things, the little edges. After awhile, those edges add up to a pretty significant advantage."

Defensive coordinator Bob Sanders' system also has contributed to Kampman's ascent. In Sanders' scheme, the ends line up wider than in previous Packer defenses and don't have to fight through as much traffic to reach the quarterback. They also aren't asked to carry as much bulk. Given the green light to trim down, Kampman gained explosiveness by dropping 10 pounds from his 2005 weight and playing at 265 – 20 pounds less than what he carried in 2004.

"The system we have now gives us a lot more freedom as defensive ends," said Kampman. "It gives you more space and a better angle to the quarterback. In coach (Ed) Donatell's and coach (Bob) Slowik's systems, the position I played wasn't featured as much in pass-rushing situations. And I didn't see the field as much on third down."

It's not uncommon for a professional athlete's production to decline after signing a lucrative contract, but Kampman gave the Packers more bang with the bigger bucks. His numbers soared in all areas after inking a four-year contract extension on the eve of the 2006 free agency period.

"The way we're compensated as pro athletes is one of the great things about our jobs," said Kampman. "People who say they're not motivated by it – that might be a little misleading because it does have some effect at some level. But it can't be your focus. I've always worked extremely hard and I think my inner motivation comes from my faith in Jesus Christ and trying to show gratitude for what I've been given for his sacrifice.

"What the contract did was give me the comfort where I didn't have to worry about the business side. It was wonderful for my family. I didn't have to move our children and my wife could continue her friendships. It just gives you stability. That's a big thing in this profession."

Kampman's work ethic is impeccable and has been a major factor in his climb up pro football's mountain. He spends more time in the dark than Roger Ebert, breaking down film of upcoming opponents. And the Lambeau Field weight room is like his second home.

"The way he prepares is a big part of what he's accomplished," said Hairston, who generated 94 career sacks in a distinguished 15-year NFL career. "He's a smart guy who is always going to know every situation. The only way to know your opponent is to study. I learned that from one of the best, (five-time Pro Bowler) Claude Humphrey, and that's what Aaron does. Sometimes, I go down to the film room pretty late Wednesday nights and he's the only one in there, watching tape, staring at that one guy across him."

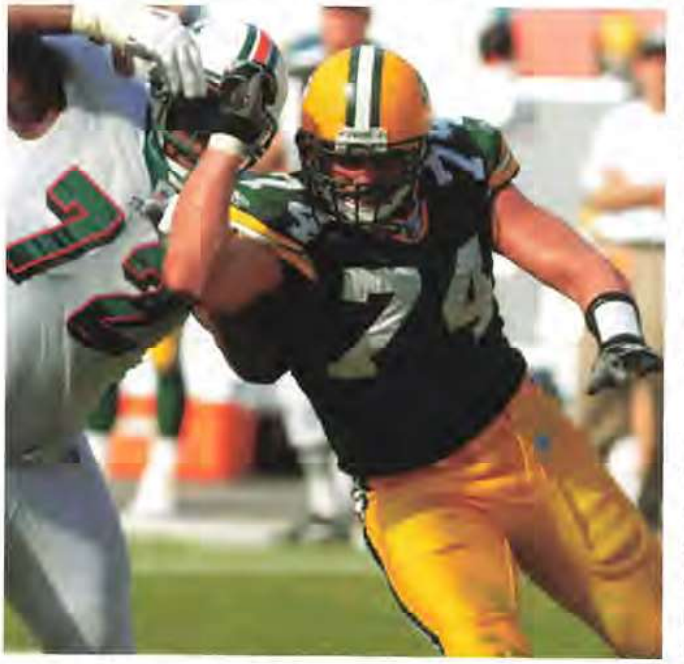
Kampman's work ethic can be traced to his small-town roots in northeast Iowa. He grew up in the tiny no-stoplight town of Kesley, where hard work was a way of life for its 80 occupants. As a child, Aaron – the middle of three sons raised by Bob and Dorothea "Dort" Kampman – often tagged along with his father to the lumber yard that Bob owned (Kesley Lumber) and helped him stack and store wood.

"When you're a boy, all you want to do is be like your dad," said Kampman. "I'd put away two-by-fours and sweep the floor, things like that. It was just fun hanging out with Dad and getting to do some of the neat things that he did.

"My dad was my role model and he learned his work ethic from my grandfather (Claas Kampman), who was a farmer with about 200 acres. We'd go to my grandpa's farm and my brothers and I always argued over who was going to get to drive the tractor. My grandma would always have ham sandwiches and lemonade for us."

By the time Aaron started high school, he and his oldest brother, Andy, had launched their own shingling business, Kampman Construction.



Kampman finished second in NFL during the 2006 season with 15.5 sacks.

Instead of sleeping late and hanging out with friends like other teens during summer vacation, the Kampman brothers spent long hours on rooftops in the hot, Iowa sun. Andy is a World Missions pastor who resides in Iowa City, while Aaron's youngest brother, Kurt, is a recent college graduate with a degree in engineering.

"We didn't do anything special in raising our boys," said Bob Kampman. "I learned from Aaron's grandfather that if you want something in life, you have to work for it. Aaron's definitely in a different world now than what Kesley, Iowa, is and a lot of different opportunities come with that. But he's basically still the same kid. All of my boys were the same way. They worked hard and didn't give us any trouble. If Mom and Dad said 'No,' they listened."

When Aaron traveled to Honolulu for the Pro Bowl, he made sure that Bob and Dort were on the plane, too – for their first trip to Hawaii – along with the parents of his wife, Linde.

"He spent more on the travel than what he made (playing in the game)," said Bob Kampman with a chuckle. "He's brought many things into our lives that we would have never thought of doing."

Kampman was a Parade All-America first-team choice as a linebacker his senior year at Aplington-Parkersburg High School and was named as Iowa's Class 2A Player of the Year. He also was an all-state basketball forward for a team that went 48-2 during his final two seasons.

Despite a school enrollment that hovers around 300, Aplington-Parkersburg has produced three other NFL players who have enjoyed long pro careers: Kansas City center Casey Wiegmann, who is in his 13th NFL season; Detroit defensive lineman Jared DeVries, a ninth-year pro; and Jacksonville center Brad Meester, an eight-year veteran.

"Casey was the first one and went on to play at Iowa, so that kind of motivated Aaron," said Bob Kampman. "It got him started lifting weights. The next thing you know, we're sitting in (former Nebraska coach) Tom Osborne's office, and Hayden Fry is sitting in our living room."

All four were coached by the school's longtime and current football coach Ed Thomas, named as the NFL's High School Football Coach of the Year in 2003.

"It's pretty crazy that all of us wound up in the NFL, and there have been a lot of other guys who have played D-3, D-2 and I-AA ball," said Aaron. "Ed has been there for, like, 30 years and I think he's had maybe one losing season. He's a tremendous coach and a tremendous man who is great at shaping the character of young men."

Aaron and Linde are high school sweethearts who met at Aplington-Parkersburg and married in college. The couple has two children, Lucas, 3, and Ben, 1.

"She was a grade up on me and we started dating the winter of her senior year," said Kampman. "I definitely married up. I was pretty fortunate."

So were the Packers when they spent the 156th overall pick of the 2002 NFL draft on Kampman.

2007 Draft Class

Draft picks build depth, add firepower to special teams

By Todd Korth - Packer Report

Brandon Jackson James Jones Justin Harrell

True to his word, Packers general manager Ted Thompson opted for the best players available in the 2007 NFL Draft.

"If we can add good people, whether they're offensive or defensive people, it doesn't really matter," said Thompson during the annual two-day draft in late April. "It's adding core value to your team."

By the time the two-day draft was over, the Packers wound up with 11 selections, thanks to two trades, in seven rounds. The team should receive an immediate impact on special teams. Whether or not any of the selections from this year's draft will make an immediate impact remains to be seen, but nearly all of them can step in and play on the kamikaze units.

"I think throughout the year, Mr. Thompson and the scouting department kept giving us guys who developed over the course of the season and continued to work hard to do that and have worked hard in the off-season since we came back March 19," said special teams coordinator Mike Stock. "Those young men have gone on to take the next step, and I think these people we brought in through the draft will be a great addition to us."

Many of the picks already have experience on special teams in college, beginning with wide receiver James Jones, who averaged 11 yards per punt return as a senior at San Jose State. Allen Barbre, a 300-pound offensive tackle selected in the fourth round, served as a 'gunner' last year at Missouri Southern State. Barbre lined up wide and used his remarkable speed to race downfield and tackle punt returners.

Aaron Rouse was picked by Thompson in the third round to compete for a starting job at safety, but the hard hitter may be more valuable as a rookie on special teams, where he and wide receiver David Clowney excelled at Virginia Tech. Clowney actually approached Virginia Tech coach Frank Beamer last season and asked to play special teams, an unusual move for a senior who was projected to be selected in the NFL Draft.

"So for him to be a senior, a top guy, an NFL prospect, to go to the coach and say, 'I'd like to be on special teams. I'd like to run down on punts.' Especially being a receiver, that's a credit to him," said Packers scout Lee Gissendaner.

The team took measures to inject life into special teams last season by selecting Cory Rodgers and Will Blackmon in the fourth round. Rodgers was cut in the pre-season and Blackmon was injured most of the season. Blackmon is back and will compete to return punts and kickoffs, but will have to beat out others to get the job in training camp.

Between Jones, Blackmon, holdover Shaun Bodiford and Charles Woodson, the Packers could be better at punt returns; Woodson averaged 8.9 yards per return last season.

Running back Brandon Jackson, selected in the second round, returned 32 kickoffs for an 18.1-yard average at

> "WE THINK REALLY AND TRULY THAT THE MORE GOOD FOOTBALL PLAYERS, REGARDLESS OF POSITION, THAT YOU CAN ADD TO YOUR TEAM, THE BETTER OFF YOU ARE AS AN ORGANIZATION AND AS A TEAM."
> -General Manager Ted Thompson

Nebraska. Clowney returned five kickoffs for 23.8 yards per return and has outstanding speed. The two rookies will compete with Vernand Morency, whose average of average of 21.6 yards per kickoff return was tied for 30th in the league last year.

Why did Thompson select linebacker Korey Hall, whom the Packers are trying to convert to fullback? Partly because of his potential as a fullback, but more because of the tenacity that he brings to special teams.

"He's an outstanding special teams player," said Thompson of Hall. "We were excited to be able to get him."

Thompson unearthed a special teams gem in Tracy White last season, a free agent linebacker who ultimately led the team in special teams tackles. Hall has all the ability to complement White and hold opponents' returners in check.

"Very productive," Stock said of Hall. "Very good tackler. A head-hunter. Good blocker in the open field."

Stock compares Hall to Bryan Johnson of the Chicago Bears. Johnson was signed as an undrafted free agent by Washington out of Boise State in 2000. He became a special teams standout as well as starting fullback when Stock was with the Redskins as special teams coordinator in 2002-03.

Remember that Green Bay didn't force a single turnover on special teams last year. While the Packers had two field goals blocked, they didn't block a kick all year, so a guy like Hall can bolster the coverage units.

A kicker in the sixth round? Why? Stock's one-word answer for the selection of strong-legged Mason Crosby of Colorado with the third of three sixth round picks said it all: "Competition."

At draft's end, Thompson defended his approach of not making noise in free agency – Giants cornerback Frank Walker had been the only acquisition.

"We don't draft based on needs, and I know that's boring ... but we don't think that's the best policy," Thompson said. "We think really and truly that the more good football players, regardless of position, that you can add to your team, the better off you are as an organization and as a team."

That's why Thompson and Co. agreed that Harrell was the best player to select in the first round.

Harrell was only the fourth defensive tackle taken by the Packers in the first round since 1970 -- Vonnie Holliday was the last in 1998. Harrell will have to be more than serviceable for the Green Bay supporters to change their tune on Thompson's approach to his third draft with the team.

Some critics may have thought the timing of the selection was puzzling because the Packers seemingly were set with Ryan Pickett and Corey Williams as the returning starting tackles and have a couple emerging prospects in Colin Cole and Johnny Jolly. Plus, they re-signed Cullen Jenkins, a productive lineman who can play end and tackle, to a four-year contract before the start of free agency.

Yet, the club was high on Harrell, despite his injury history, and is convinced the imposing run stopper can be a front-line contributor for a defense that sometimes struggled defending the run in '06.

"We're going to build this football team strong with the offensive and defensive lines," head coach Mike McCarthy said. "You just cannot have enough big guys."

Thompson proceeded by using two trades – one on each day of the draft – to turn nine picks into 11.

The Packers added some offensive power, grabbing Jackson after trading down to the back end of Round 2. His quickness and ability to cut on a dime make him a suitable fit for the zone-blocking run scheme, plus the added dimension he brings as a player able to shed tackles.

Jackson and Morency are similar, shifty backs who can make the necessary cuts and slip defenders. Both will likely share the load at the outset as the offense goes forward without veteran Ahman Green, who signed with the Houston Texans in free agency.

Thompson is hoping that by selecting the best "football guys" possible through the draft the team will improve on its 8-8 record from 2006. If the Packers' special teams drastically improve this season, this year's draft class might be the main reason for the improvement.

"I hope in time that they will think that this is a good draft," Thompson said. "It's difficult to evaluate a draft even if you study it all the time because you don't really know how it's going to work out. We certainly hope that in time it turns out to be a good thing for the Packers."

The Packers Go To St. Norbert

FOR THE 50TH YEAR, THE GREEN AND GOLD WILL BUNK AND DINE AT THE COLLEGE

By Art Daley

Lombardi established a strong Packers/St. Norbert relationship.

The Packers and St. Norbert College – a private Catholic liberal arts college just outside Green Bay in De Pere, Wis. – have a relationship that's going on 50 years.

Yes, the Packers have been eating, sleeping and meeting in the institution's dormitories for about six weeks annually since 1958 – the year the Packers had their worst season, 1-10-1.

Since then, 10 head coaches bunked their teams at St. Norbert College, posting a 410-333-14 (.551) record – not to mention six NFL championships, including three Super Bowl wins.

Strangely, St. Norbert never received much of a tumble from Mr. and Mrs. Packers Fan, since the big news is the team preparing for the preseason and league games and not where they eat and sleep.

The Packers' relationship with the college is unique and easily a long-stay National Football League record. Some of the league's other teams stay at motels and practice nearby during training camp.

Packers founder Curly Lambeau generally held practices at home and the players stayed around town but one year took them to Rhinelander and later to Rockwood Lodge near Dykesville. Lambeau's successor, Gene Ronzani, hauled the team all the way to Grand Rapids, Minn., and then Lisle Blackbourn trained them at UW-Stevens Point.

Oddly, the Packers' first brush with St. Norbert goes back to 1922, when Lambeau had his Pack scrimmage against George Carey's Green Knights at the college. Carey wound up (informally) coaching the Pack for a year while Lambeau called the shots as captain.

Who first connected the Pack and St. Nubbert? It would have to be the Rev. Dennis Burke, St. Norbert president, and Packers president Russ Bogda. They brought Blackbourn to the college in the spring of '57 and arrangements were made to start in '58.

Blackbourn was fired after his 3-9 season and Ray (Scooter) McLean had the honor of being the first Packers head coach using St. Norbert College.

Scooter's bad season set the stage for the arrival of Vince Lombardi, a devout Catholic, and he immediately became a good friend of St. Norbert. Besides coaching the Packers to great successes, Lombardi served as a St. Norbert fund-raiser and a member of the school's board of governors. He received an honorary doctor of law degree in 1968, his last year in Green Bay.

Lombardi had to display his discipline in his first year. Jim Temp, a Packer offensive/defensive end (1957-60) and now a retired Green Bay business executive, remembered the time Paul Hornung and Max McGee snuck out of the dorms one night.

Vince found out and fined each $500. Temp said, "That was a lot of money then. The coach told the whole team about it the next day and gave a warning."

Hazing was often a problem in training camps around the NFL, but Temp recalled that "hazing was a lot of fun with us. The rookies had to sing and it was usually 'My Echo, My Shadow and Me.'"

Brian Noble, a nine-season Packer linebacker (1985-93) and now president of the Green Bay Blizzard, captured a good-sized hawk in center Mark Cannon's backyard, and had it in his St. Norbert room one year.

The college every year had to bring in larger mattresses and frames to accommodate the athletes, and all the rooms were air-conditioned. When the Packers left, all the bed items were put back in storage for the next year.

"Mark Murphy was my roommate and that hawk slept right with us. I finally had to let him go."

Noble, who played for three head coaches (Forrest Gregg, Lindy Infante and Mike Holmgren), said, "We had to worry about Chuck Cecil. One night one of the assistant coaches caught him in a tree and he was trying to get out."

Dr. Tom Manion, St. Norbert president for 18 years (1983-2000), chuckled when told that the players tried to sneak out, and explained, "We had to increase security because a girl or two tried to get in."

Manion said, "We enjoyed our relationship with the Packers and for a few years they added some bonus money to what they owed for meals and staying there. We always had great food, and you know we had to have special beds for them."

Dan Froelich, head chef, said, "We had breakfast for them at 6:30 a.m., lunch time would vary, and dinner was at 5:15 p.m. Dinner was steaks, poultry or seafood - plus good desserts and night snacks."

Even though players now are larger than back in the 1960s and '70s, the college every year had to bring in larger mattresses and frames to accommodate the athletes, and all the rooms were air-conditioned. When the Packers left, all the bed items were put back in storage for the next year.

The Rev. Brendan McKeough was teaching at St. Norbert during Lombardi's time, and he remembered when Wellington Mara, owner of the New York Giants, Lombardi's former team, was in Green Bay for a preseason game.

McKeough recalled, "Wellington asked me if I could say a Mass at the college for his brother Jack, who had just died. Well, it was arranged and Vince served as altar boy. During the Mass, the lights went out and we had to finish under candle light. The wives of Vince and Wellington were there too." Wellington Mara died in 2005.

Before St. Norbert, the Packers made four different training camp stops - the first in 1935 when Lambeau slept the team at Pinewood Lodge in Rhinelander. The Packers won three NFL championships (1936, '39 and '44) while staying in Green Bay, but Lambeau still wanted to move, this time to Rockwood Lodge (1947-49).

Living conditions were great at Rockwood, but the granite foundation practice field loaded with stones gave the players shin splints and leg cramps. Shortly before Lambeau resigned, Rockwood burned to the ground, giving the Packers some much-needed insurance money.

Ronzani kept his players in Green Bay in 1950, and then decided on Grand Rapids where the Philadelphia Eagles trained in 1949-50. Grand Rapids was rather boring, a lot of card playing, just waiting around, according to linebacker Deral Teteak, who related this laugher:

"One day this car trailer and boat pulled up to the practice field. Ronzani jumped out and yelled, 'Have a good practice,' and away he went. That's the truth."

Very soon, the 2007 Packers squad will be packing up their cars (presumably with no boats in tow) and move their belongings into the dorm rooms in De Pere. Undoubtedly, they, too, will create some unique stories to build on the half-century tradition at St. Norbert.

Editor's note: St. Norbert College was founded in 1898 by the Rev. Bernard Pennings, who later became an Abbott. The college has an enrollment of 2,100.

Team Up On and Off the Field

By Jason Wilde - Wisconsin State Journal

You can almost hear longtime public relations director Lee Remmel, now the Green Bay Packers official team historian, in that deep baritone of his, finding just the right phrase to describe them. Something grandiose and noble sounding.

Transcendent tandems, maybe. Or consummate combos. Or tremendous twosomes. Or prominent pairs. Whatever moniker Remmel would come up with, it'd be alliterative and apropos.

But as much of a wordsmith as Remmel proved to be during his 29 years covering the team and 33 years working for it, the relationships between wide receivers Donald Driver and Greg Jennings and cornerbacks Al Harris and Charles Woodson go beyond a snappy catchphrase.

Both duos met last season, after Woodson came over from the Oakland Raiders as a free agent and Jennings was drafted in the second round.

Once together, Driver had the second Pro Bowl season of his career, catching a career-high 92 passes for 1,295 yards with eight touchdowns. Jennings, meanwhile, got his rookie season off to a fantastic start before a midseason ankle injury limited his production during the second half of the season. He finished with 45 catches for 632 yards and three TDs.

On the other side of the ball, Woodson's signing gave the Packers two shutdown quality corners, combining with Harris to intercept 11 passes and break up 46. While Woodson's eight interceptions were a career high and tied him for the most in the NFC, neither player earned a trip to the Pro Bowl in Hawaii, although Harris was an alternate.

In 2007, they'll be aiming for bigger and better things -- and their relationships with each other will play a key role in whether the Packers can improve on their 8-8 finish last year.

During the offseason, both tandems sat down and talked about their relationship with one another and their goals for this season.

DRIVER & JENNINGS

Q: You two met when Greg arrived for the post-draft minicamp last spring. Did you know right away that you'd get along?

DRIVER: You know, I can't say that we made a connection right off the bat. It was all about me getting to know him, because he was a very quiet guy. Me and Ferg (wide receiver Robert Ferguson) were the jokers of the bunch, and we used to joke with him all the time. And I guess he wasn't one of those guys who liked (that). I guess you could say straight face. As we've gotten to know him over the last year's time, he's gotten more into activities and started to laugh and is starting to make his own jokes.

JENNINGS: I knew right off the top -- and it wasn't just Driver, it was Ferg as well -- that they were definitely going to help me in my growing stages. I knew Drive was a pretty good receiver and he definitely had had some success over the years. I knew he would be a guy I would be able to sponge off of.

Q: Donald, what impressed you about the youngster coming in?

DRIVER: I think his catching was the biggest thing that surprised me. I was like, `This guy can really catch.' But I'd always tell him, when he'd come back to the sideline, `Catch and tuck. Catch and tuck.' Because he always would catch, look at the ball, then tuck it. And he kept saying, `All right,' but he never did it. The first game of the season, against Chicago, Brett throws him a slant I think, and he gets popped (and fumbles). I didn't say, `Don't worry about it.' He comes to the sideline, and all I say is, `Catch and tuck. I told you to catch and tuck.' I remember after the game him talking to the media and them asking what Donald said to him and he said, `Well, he wasn't nice at all.' And that's basically the way I've always seen him. But he's a very talented receiver.

Q: So you took a mentor approach then?

DRIVER: For me, it was just like coaching. I didn't want to tell him, `You're great, you're good.' I gave him credit when he made a great catch or ran a great route, but I wanted to make sure he knew what he was up against.

Q: Is that what makes your relationship work, that big brother-little brother dynamic?

JENNINGS: You could say that. He calls me `Baby Boy' all the time, I guess that's his little nickname for me. He knows I look up to him, I definitely go to him whenever I have questions with anything regarding football. He's definitely like a big brother I've never had before. He's a great guy.

FRIENDS DON'T LET FRIENDS WATCH SOCCER.

DRIVER: Coming in here in '99 as a seventh-round pick and having everyone telling me I'm not going to make this team, I look at myself like a Free (Antonio Freeman) or Corey Bradford or Bill Schroeder. Because those were the guys who really told me what I had to do. It wasn't the receivers coach at that time. I learned from them. They taught me. And that's what I want to do for these guys like Greg. I'm trying to do everything in my power to help them be successful.

Q: Do you spend much time together off the field?

JENNINGS: We don't. I'm pretty much a family-oriented guy, I get along with him great, but outside of the stadium, I try to spend as much time with my family as possible.

DRIVER: Not at all. When you're with your family, you're with your family. And I'm one of those guys that, Rob Davis and Brett (Favre) are probably the closest friends on the team that I have, and my family and Brett's family don't get together. It's just one of those things that, in the offseason, you want to enjoy your family as much as possible.

Q: Now that you've been together for a year, how will you help each other this season?

JENNINGS: I definitely think he's helped me more than I've helped him. Just watching him and the way he goes about his business and how he carries himself, and his knowledge, it's easy to soak and sponge off a guy like that. With me, the way I pick up things, he'll do something and then I'll turn around and do it exactly the same. I treat my vets with respect and gain their respect. That's just the way I am. We're both here for the same reason -- to win ballgames -- we both want to win, we both want to be successful in our own ways. When you have two guys like that who are both willing to help one another and work with one another by each others side day-in and day-out, it was easy for us to get along and click.

DRIVER: He will be a great receiver. I just think everyone still has stuff to learn. He got his feet wet last year, got thrown into the fire, and he played well until he got hurt. I think he's back now, and ready to prove what he can really do.

WOODSON & HARRIS

Q: Did you guys first meet when Charles showed up for the mandatory post-draft minicamp?

HARRIS: Obviously I'd watched him play a lot, but I hadn't met him until the first day he came in. I actually called him when he took his (free-agent) visit. I heard he was here, I gave him a call.

Q: Was it a sales-pitch call?

WOODSON: I think it was more of just the excitement of the opportunity of having another player like myself on the other side of the ball (that caused Harris to call). Before I got here, it was a good defense. It wasn't like I was going to come in here and do that much more for him -- just to have another guy that can go over there on the other side and hold it down, I think it was exciting for him. That was basically what it was about.

Q: Did you know you'd be friends right away?

HARRIS: Definitely. No doubt. He's a good dude, man. Very, very smart. I can learn a lot from him -- not necessarily football-wise, but off-the-field. He's seen things that I haven't seen. I think besides our professional relationship, he's someone I can truly call a friend. If I really need to talk to somebody about something, I have no problem calling him.

WOODSON: I guess some people you just get a good feel for right off the bat. Of course with him being a corner and us being around each other just because of the position we play, we got to feel each other out. It's just one of those things. I drew to him, he kind of drew to me, and we just became friends over time.

IT'S REALLY NOT A FAMILY REUNION.

IT JUST FEELS THAT WAY.

Our heritage is your heritage. Our glory is your glory. And our house is your house. Drop in and stay awhile. Bring your family. Bring your friends. Because you belong here.

Q: Do you spend much time together off the field?

HARRIS: We're cool. We hang out. He was just down in Miami. We ate at my parents' house. We do things together. Chill out. Might catch a movie or something. We both like red wine. Or we'll have some sushi. Talk football, talk business.

WOODSON: After practice sometimes, I may go by his house or whatever. It's not like we do a whole lot together. Al is married now, he has kids, so I'm not going to infringe on his time. But his father is in town a lot, so after games, if I don't have anyone in town, I'll go over there -- his father cooks a lot. I have family up every now and then, but not as much as his people.

Q: Did Al help you adjust to Green Bay? It's a lot different than the San Francisco Bay Area that you came from.

WOODSON: I think him and also (safety) Nick Collins are the two guys who off the field I spend the majority of my time with. So it's helped, having those guys. (Al) has been here a couple years, so when I came in, he'd be like, `Wood, I'm going to get something to eat, you want to come?' And I'd jump in the car with him and we'd go eat and talk and then go our separate ways. Then we'd meet up again tomorrow and it'd be me and him talking again. That's the way it's worked out.

Q: Driver and Jennings have an older brother-younger brother kind of relationship. Obviously that's not the case with you two.

HARRIS: I think with me and Wood, it's just more of a thing where I respect his game, he respects my game. Not that we don't on the field get mad at each other. A guy catches a ball on me, he gives me this look. A guy catches a ball on him, I give him this look. But it's never disrespectful or anything like that. We've got the same goals in mind.

WOODSON: We're more like twins, you know what I mean? We're going through the fire together. It's not a matter of me teaching him or him teaching me. We both know what we have to do and we make it happen together. That's exactly how I see it -- twins. We're both great corners. Let's go out there and get it done together and have fun doing it.

Q: So there's no rivalry there?

WOODSON: We're competing on interceptions at all times. We definitely keep track of how many the other guy has. So when I jumped out there on him last year, his main thing was, `I've got to make some plays. I've got to catch up.' So there's definitely a competition. But that makes us both better, makes the team better.

HARRIS: When I first met him, I knew it wasn't going to be an ego thing. I'm not a big ego guy. I respect him, he respects me. I know I don't know everything. And he knows he doesn't know everything. I think it's just the presence. Teams can't just pick on one side. They've got to spread it around. When you've got another guy on the other side of you who holds up his end of the bargain, it's going to bring your level of play up. Because you're going to say to yourself, `OK, I have to hold up my end of the bargain, too.' It makes you better.

Q: That dynamic certainly seemed to work. One could argue that both of you deserved to go to the Pro Bowl last year, although neither of you actually did.

HARRIS: That's what we talk about. That's our goal this year, for both of us to make it over. But if it happens that one of us (is chosen), both of us will go. So if I make it, he's definitely invited, and if he makes it, I know I'm invited. So we're sticking with that agreement. But that's our goal, for both of us to make it over.

WOODSON: You look at last year, there's no reason why both of us weren't over there. But if I was to make it, there's no question at all that he was going over there with me. That's how that is.

PASSION for EXCELLENCE

Tight-Knit Offensive Linemen Holding Steady

By Todd McMahon

Even the best relationships aren't assured smooth sailing.

Consider what transpired on the Pacific Ocean in May this year. Daryn Colledge hosted five of his fellow offensive linemen for a five-day fishing expedition in his home state of Alaska.

"A lot of those guys had never been out on the ocean," said Colledge, recounting some vivid snapshots of a journey that wasn't nausea-free at times.

"They got a nice little experience," Colledge continued with a mischievous chuckle. "It was 6- to-8-foot rollers (waves) out there."

To compound matters, the perpetually ravenous players took to the choppy water without sustenance one day, having inadvertently left the grub behind at their cabin.

"Absolutely miserable," Jason Spitz bemoaned afterward.

While the 42-foot vessel carrying the six hulking men wasn't mistaken for the "Love Boat," the extended outing more than 3,000 miles from Green Bay yielded a great deal for the better.

Chad Clifton, with some assistance from Colledge, had the biggest of the whopping catches on the trip with a halibut in excess of 90 pounds. About 200 pounds of fish were cleaned, packaged and shipped back to some of the guys.

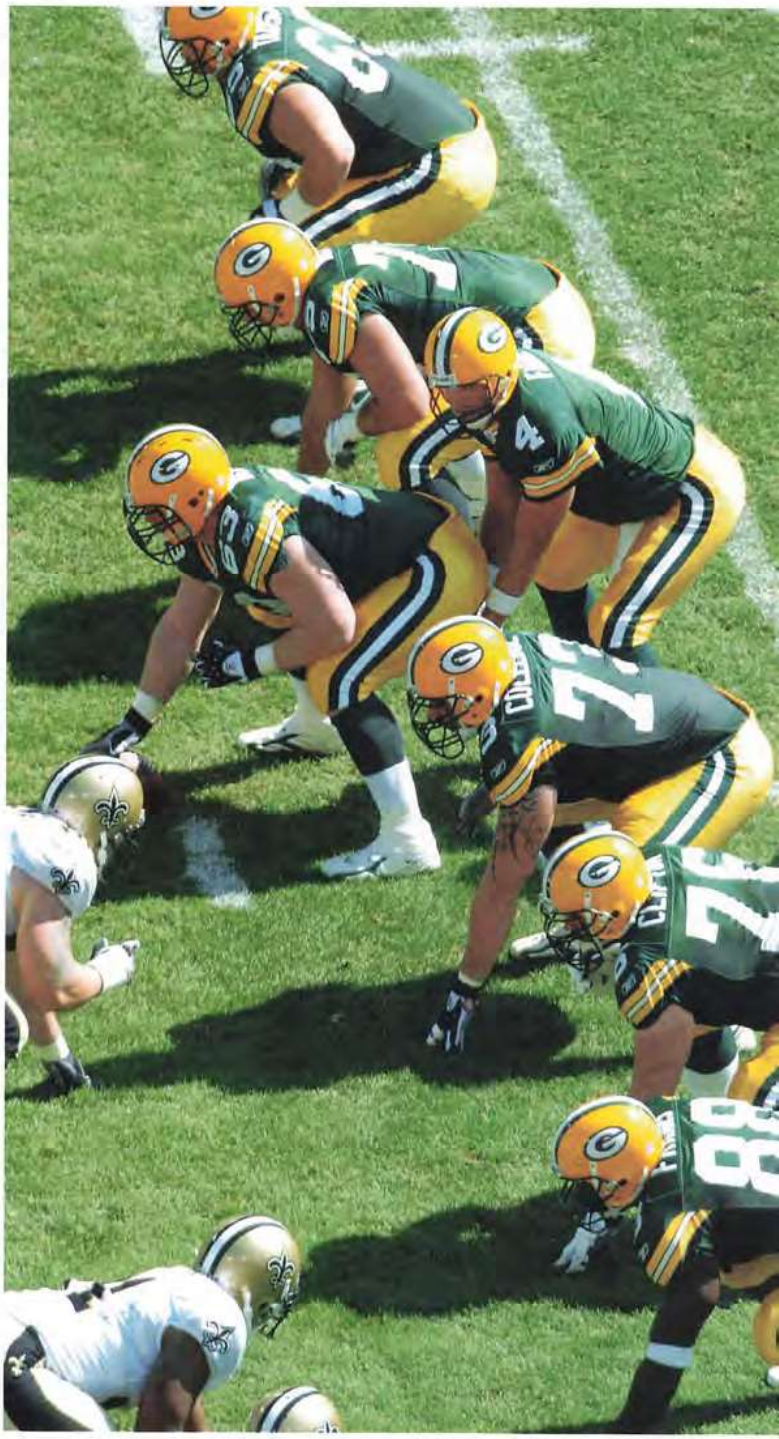
The beer-battered halibut and fish tacos, that would be in abundance the ensuing months, weren't expected to last long. Rarely do two or three days pass when the offensive linemen haven't been together.

"There's a huge bond with us," said Scott Wells, who was part of the Alaskan adventure with Colledge, Clifton, Spitz, Mark Tauscher and Tony Moll. "I'd have to say we're all friends, which is huge. If you can be friends off the field, you can be friends on the field."

The friendship across the line was ratcheted up this offseason. From the start of the Packers' workout program in March to the end of organized team activities in June, Wells said the linemen would typically hang out with one another away from team headquarters at Lambeau Field three days a week.

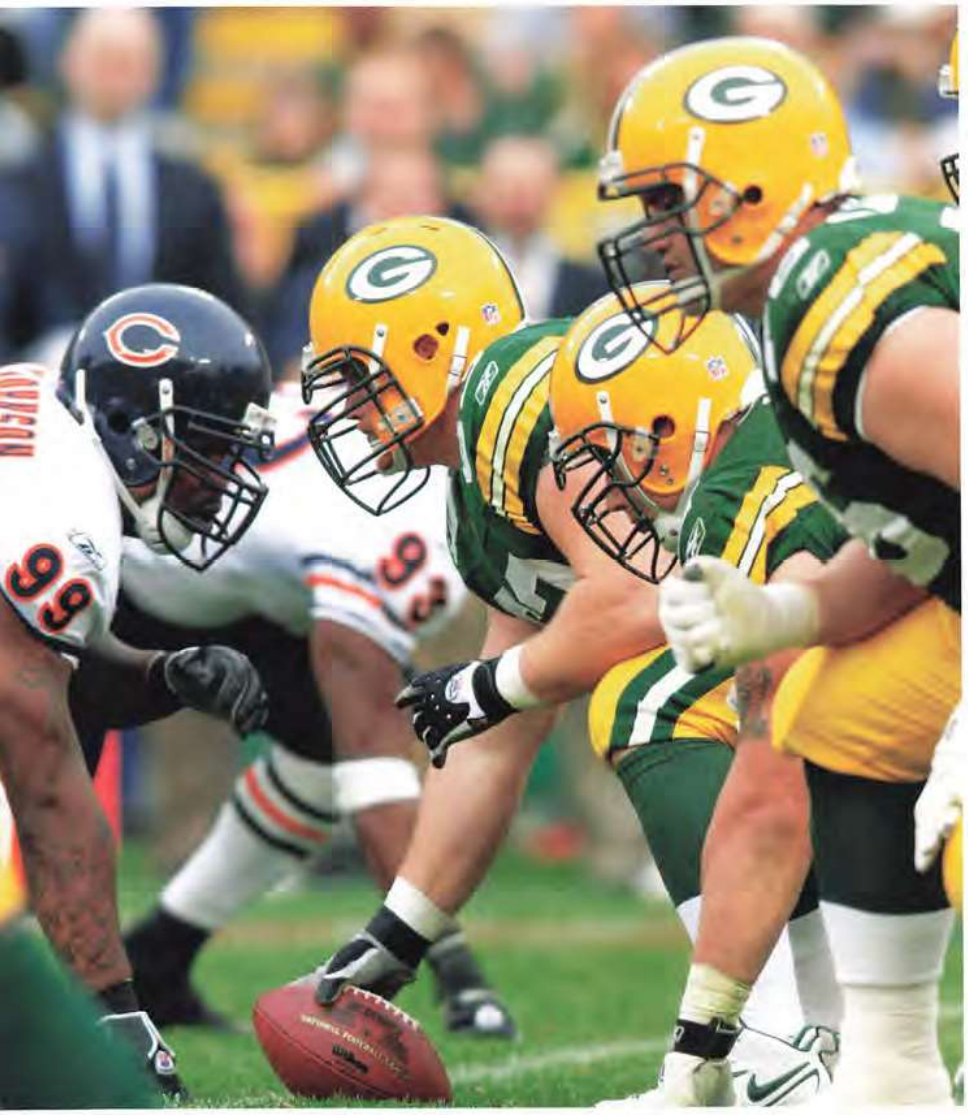
Popular activities included bowling, golf, playing cards, going to the movie theater and, naturally, eating.

"Anything to keep us busy and off the couch," Moll said.



What might come as a surprise is that these inseparable 300-pounds-plus giants hardly ever get tired of being around each other so much.

"You spend as much time with one guy, especially in our position where you're relying on guys so much, you kind of want to see that guy off the field, too," Colledge said.



The friendship across the line was ratcheted up this offseason. From the start of the Packers' workout program in March to the end of organized team activities in June, Wells said the linemen would typically hang out with one another away from team headquarters at Lambeau Field three days a week.

Tauscher, now a "graybeard" of the unit along with Clifton in their eighth pro year, asserted that the healthy relationship among the linemen – starters and backups – is paramount as the Packers try to reassert themselves in the trenches.

From 2001 to '04, the Packers had one of the more dominant O-lines in the NFL with Clifton and Tauscher at the tackle positions, Mike Wahle and Marco Rivera at the guard spots and Mike Flanagan at center. The sturdy quintet began to dissolve, however, as Wahle and Rivera left in free agency in 2005 and Flanagan moved on last year.

"Times changed, things happened, and we had to kind of reload and restart," Tauscher said.

The rebuilding of the interior of the line went into full swing under General Manager Ted Thompson in 2006. Wells, a seventh-round draft pick in 2004, assumed a full-time starting gig at center. Thompson used first-day draft picks on Colledge (second round) and Spitz (third), targeting the pair as potential starting candidates at guard.

Moll was considered to be a project after the Packers selected the converted tight end in the fifth round. Yet, he turned out to be a quick study and wound up getting almost as much front-line exposure as Colledge and Spitz did last season.

The trio combined for 38 starts in a history-making season. The Packers had previously never plugged three rookies into the O-line starting lineup in the same year.

"There's no substitute for experience," said Tauscher, who like Clifton, started as a rookie in 2000. "When guys gain experience, they're just going to be better football players. Talent-wise, all of these young guys are incredibly talented guys. It's just going to come down to how quickly we can get this thing together and how effective we can be as a full unit."

For various reasons, the offensive line wasn't fully intact last season.

Colledge temporarily lost his starting job at left guard in the wake of a subpar performance in the first preseason game at San Diego. That gave Moll an opportunity to slide in at right guard, as Spitz moved to left guard.

Spitz, though, suffered a thigh injury in the regular-season opener against Chicago and was out the next two games. That led to Colledge's return as starter at left guard, and he never landed on the bench again. Moll stepped aside when Spitz was healthy again. Yet, he was pressed into another start at right guard after Clifton fell ill on the eve of the game at Miami, creating a shift of Colledge to left tackle and Spitz to left guard.

Toward the end of the season, Moll logged five starts at right tackle after Tauscher was felled by a groin injury.

In all, the Packers had five different starting line combinations last season. That's far too many revolutions of the door to the liking of head coach Mike McCarthy and first-year offensive coordinator Joe Philbin, who was the line coach last season.

> "I THINK OUR OFFENSIVE LINE CAN BE AS GOOD AN OFFENSIVE LINE AS WE'VE EVER HAD HERE. I THINK AS THE SEASON PROGRESSED LAST YEAR, YOU SAW THAT. NOW, WE KIND OF HAVE TO TAKE IT TO THE NEXT LEVEL."
> -Brett Favre

In hindsight, though, the coaches can't underestimate what the accelerated learning curve and excessive seasoning for the rookies meant not only for their own development but the progress of the line and the offense as a whole moving forward. By the end of last season, growing pains that were prevalent in the first half had been replaced by building blocks with a unit that was finally jelling and getting the hang of the new zone-blocking scheme.

McCarthy had high praise for the previously embattled Colledge, calling him the most improved player at season's end.

Philbin said Wells, a target for critics because of a short reach, strong-armed the competition by giving up less than a full sack in 2006.

"When we first got together in February (last year), there were a lot of holes on that depth chart (for the line), as far as there was nobody there," said McCarthy, in his second year as head coach. "In just a short time, it's a credit to Ted Thompson, the personnel staff and the coaches and their evaluation on the number of young guys we've taken and the quality of young players we have there.

"I think we have a very, very bright future starting this year with the offensive line."

The latter sentiment is shared by another key observer on the team.

"I think our offensive line can be as good an offensive line as we've ever had here," said Brett Favre, the Packers' starting quarterback since 1992. "I think as the season progressed last year, you saw that. Now, we kind of have to take it to the next level."

The Packers were likely to open this season with Clifton at left tackle, Colledge at left guard, Wells at center, Spitz at right guard and Tauscher at right tackle.

Some of the linemen concurred that continuity would be critical as the offense tries to re-establish its once-dominant running attack. Perhaps more pressure falls on the line in 2007 because Ahman Green, the franchise's No. 2 all-time leading rusher, left for Houston in free agency and there were question marks throughout the offseason about who would fill the huge void.

"Ahman's a big loss, obviously, and we all liked Ahman," Colledge said. "But, we're excited about what 'Mo' (Vernand Morency) and Noah (Herron) can do. They proved (last year) that they can get out and run the ball when they have to. And, we'll see what the young guys can do. We feel that if we do our job, you can put anybody back there."

Tauscher points to the lengths the youthful, new-look offensive line has gone to act and play as one entity as reason to believe the group is ready to set sail this season. After all, they've survived some rocky times together literally out at sea.

"I think we're growing," Tauscher said. "It's important to be able to trust each other and to be able to go out and have fun and know each other off the field. We spend so much time with these guys.

"In order to have effective communication, you have to kind of understand who you're dealing with. I think that's where going out and doing stuff in the offseason is definitely beneficial."

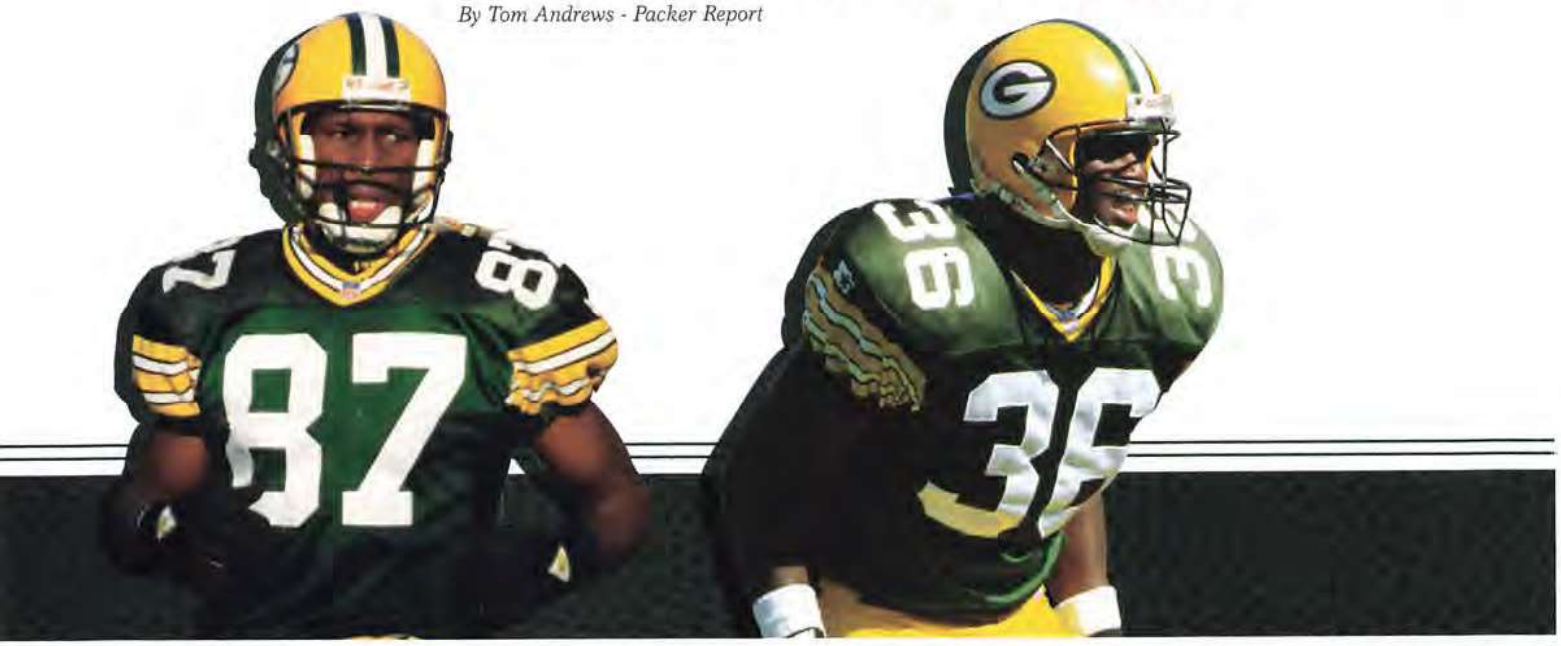
Robert Brooks, LeRoy Butler

POISED FOR PACKERS HALL OF FAME

By Tom Andrews - Packer Report



Timing is everything. What if they had come to Green Bay in the mid-1970s or the mid-1980s? They could have been just a couple of very talented players toiling for forgettable teams before fading from memory.

Happily, for LeRoy Butler and Robert Brooks, that didn't happen. After more than 20 years of disappointing teams and faded bumper stickers proclaiming "The Pack Will Be Back," the Packers of the 1990s were about ready to turn the corner. Enter Butler and Brooks – just in time to help grab the steering wheel and guide the Packers to a pair of Super Bowls. For their outstanding efforts, Butler and Brooks will have a lasting legacy in the Green Bay Packers Hall of Fame.

"If you think about it, in 1990 we were 6-10," Butler recalled of the year the Packers made him their second round draft choice. "I went to Florida State where three years in a row we won 10 games and went to three prestigious bowls. I was used to winning and before that, in high school, we went to the playoffs three straight years and won 30 games in three seasons. I was used to winning and I was used to fighting through adversity."

The ability to fight through adversity served Butler well in Packerland. The Packers were expecting big things in 1990 after a promising 1989 season in which they won 10 games and came within an eyelash of making the playoffs. It all turned out to be a big tease. "In my second year with the Packers, we were 6-10," said Butler.

There was no time to sulk. The winds of change were moving swiftly. Before long, "We had this big, tall new guy Mike Holmgren coming in as our new coach. I got a call from (former Dallas Cowboy running back) Emmitt Smith saying how great the Super Bowl was and I wished that one day I could get a chance to play in a Super Bowl. Things started to turn around when Ron Wolf got there and said, 'We're going to make a change.' When we made that change, (defensive coordinator) Ray Rhodes called me into his office and asked what I'd think about moving to safety because they wanted to draft Terrell Buckley in the first round. I thought, 'Man, I'm going to get killed!' I was only 179 pounds but it's not about how big you are. It's how smart and how fast you are."

In 12 stellar seasons with the Green and Gold (1990-2001), Butler was plenty fast and plenty smart. He played in more games (181) than any other defensive back in club history. In fact, only six other players have played in more games than Butler: Brett Favre (239), Bart Starr (196), Ray Nitschke (190), Forrest Gregg (187) and William Henderson (187). No. 36 always seemed to be around the football and had a knack for making the big play. He snared 38 interceptions – fourth most in team history and only one short of third-ranking Herb Adderley (39) – and was Green Bay's interceptions leader in five different seasons (1990-91, '93, '95, '97). Butler also loved to lay in the weeds and then blitz the unsuspecting quarterback, a tactic that earned him 20.5 career sacks.

Naturally, the honors piled up for Butler, too. Four Pro

Bowl appearances. Five All-Pro designations and a spot on the NFL's 1990s All-Decade team chosen by the Pro Football Hall of Fame's Selection Committee.

"I always looked at LeRoy as the guy on defense," said Tampa Bay Buccaneers' coach Jon Gruden, a Holmgren assistant at the time. "Obviously, Reggie White came in and, rightfully so, deserved tremendous respect. But, as a home-grown Packer, I think LeRoy looked at it as if it was his team and his responsibility to make sure we played well.

Butler (pictured) and Brooks are both credited as pioneers of the Lambeau Leap.

"I'm amazed that people don't talk about him more. I think maybe he was overshadowed by Ronnie Lott and some of the other guys in the NFC at that time."

As the Packers' receivers coach, Gruden also knew first-hand what the Packers had in Robert Brooks, a third-rounder out of South Carolina. "He came in there and took a lot of heat from Sterling Sharpe because Sterling was 'The Man' at South Carolina," Gruden recalled. "He wanted to make sure that Robert had it squared away who was 'The Man' (in Green Bay). The first year Robert was there, he caught 12 passes and we were trying to make him the punt returner. He dropped some passes and was in and out of Coach Holmgren's doghouse, as most rookies were.

"He could run and run and run and he worked so hard on his game. I'll never forget the first year he really took off and exploded on the scene. I was so happy and so proud of him because there's not a harder working guy than Robert Brooks. Everything he got, he deserved."

In seven seasons with the Packers (1992-98), Brooks ranks 11th on the Packers' all-time receiving list with 306 catches for 4,225 yards and 32 touchdowns. He owns the team's single-season record for receiving yards (1,497 in 1995). That year, Brooks amassed 102 receptions and set a team, single-season record with nine 100-yard games.

With such an outstanding performance in 1995, Brooks was looking to follow it up in 1996 as Green Bay put together a world championship. His bid was cut short in Week 7 against the 49ers in Green Bay when he tore up his knee. Though his season was finished, Brooks still looks back on that year with great delight.

"It was a great season," said Brooks with a giggle in his voice. "It was kind of destiny for us to go to the Super Bowl and win it. We had made our mind up after playing Dallas in 1995. We lost and we just made our mind up that we were going to go to the Super Bowl. We were not going to fall short the following year. Guys went home in the off-season and that's the way we set our hearts."

Brooks found himself a sideline spectator in New Orleans for Super Bowl XXXI. "It was great because I got to see the game from a different perspective," he explains. "You know what goes into training and preparing for the games. Having been there and been a starter myself, you know what the guys have been through during the season and you know the kind of work they put in. It was a great feeling watching them from the perspective I had."

Butler and Brooks are united in a very special way. Butler started a Green Bay tradition – the Lambeau Leap – and Brooks perfected it. Butler did it out of spontaneous exhilaration after racing into the end zone after Reggie White flipped a recovered fumble to Butler in 1993. "Not only did Robert help me make the Lambeau Leap famous by putting a song together, he would do it in a fashion where we would give style points for how high you could jump into the stands," Butler said.

As they head into the Hall together, Butler and Brooks make it very clear that they are extremely thankful for the opportunity to have played for the fans in Green Bay. "The one thing I'd like to be remembered for is the bond that we tried to create between the players and the fans because we needed it to come together," said Brooks. "The Lambeau Leap wasn't the only thing. We had a group of guys that kept themselves open to the fans and were interested in the relationship between the fans and the players."

"I can't thank the fans enough," added Butler. "If it wasn't for the fans, I don't think I would have been there. When I got there, there were 1,500 people at the airport on a Wednesday to welcome me to Green Bay. No other team does that. When I'd go to the local shops, people didn't want autographs, they wanted to tell me how much they appreciated my play. In 1995, the Rams beat us at home and there were 30,000 people outside the stadium chanting, 'Go Pack Go!' No other stadium would have done that. Everybody would have gone home griping. They didn't do that in Green Bay."

And how does Butler want fans to remember him? "I want them to remember a guy that smiles 24/7, loved playing the game and knew I never played for the money. I played for the cheers. That's how I want them to remember me."

Rob Davis

STEADY VETERAN CAPTAINS PACKERS' SPECIAL TEAMS UNIT

By Dylan B. Tomlinson

The long arduous road that Rob Davis took to the NFL has taught him some valuable lessons.

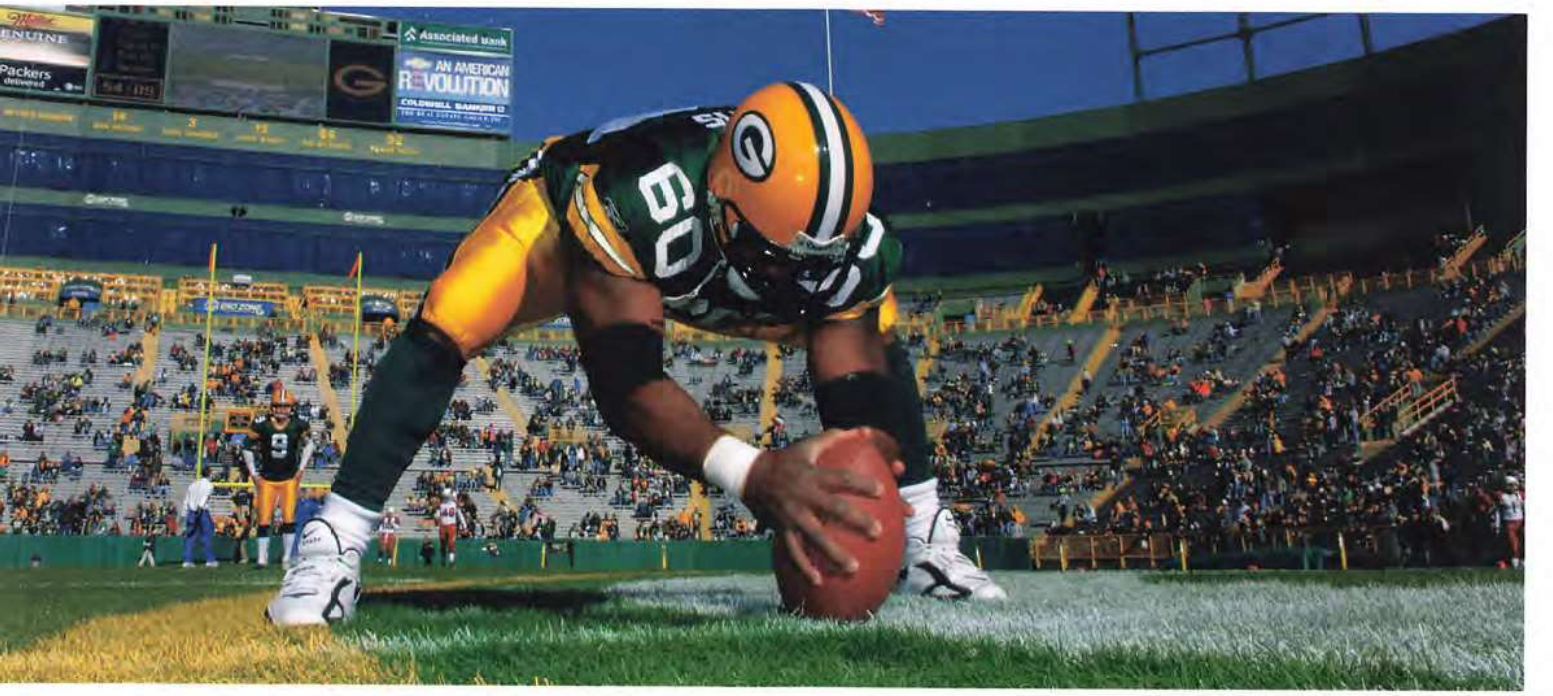
Davis' first taste of the NFL came in 1993, when he was signed by the New York Jets as an undrafted free agent. The Jets cut him at the end of training camp.

The following year went similarly. He signed with the Jets only to be cut right before the final roster was announced. In 1995, Davis had to go to the Canadian Football League.

The following season, he was once again a training camp casualty.

But on Nov. 4, 1997, Davis' luck would change. Paul Frase had been the long snapper in Green Bay that season, but when he was sidelined with a back injury, the Packers signed Davis, who played in the final seven games of the regular season, the playoffs and the Super Bowl.

Almost a full decade later, Davis remains in Green Bay.



"I DON'T TAKE A SINGLE DAY IN THIS LEAGUE FOR GRANTED. IF THERE'S ANYBODY IN THE NFL WHO KNOWS HOW DIFFICULT IT IS TO MAKE IT, IT'S ME."

- Rob Davis

The following year he was back in the NFL with the Kansas City Chiefs. But once again, he was cut at the end of training camp. He was signed by the Chicago Bears, and finally made an NFL roster. He lasted for the entire season as their long snapper.

Only quarterback Brett Favre has been with the Packers longer. Davis freely admits he didn't expect his NFL tenure to last this long.

"When I got here I just wanted to stay for the rest of the season," Davis said. "In this league you can't think in terms of multiple seasons, and to think you're going to be somewhere 10 years later just isn't done at all. It doesn't matter who you are."

But, after coming out of NCAA Division II Shippensburg College and being cut four times, Davis learned some tough lessons that have undoubtedly played a large role in why he's been able to last so long.

"I don't take a single day in this league for granted," Davis said. "If there's anybody in the NFL who knows how difficult it is to make it, it's me."

Even after more than a decade in the NFL, Davis said he is fueled by the fear of losing his job. While it would be easy to get complacent after so many years in the league, Davis has never allowed himself to take anything for granted.

"Every year when I show up for training camp, I am worried about being cut," Davis said. "Even during the season if I get an unexpected call from a coach, I start to wonder if something is going on. That might sound stupid to some, but I think that motivates me and is part of the reason why I'm still here. That's the way this league is. If a team thinks there's someone better out there, you'll be gone the next day." One of the reasons Davis is still around is because there may not be a better long snapper in the NFL. There have been NFL teams who have tried to consolidate the position and give the job to someone who also plays a position.

"It's easy to think that way, but you can't allow yourself to do that," Green Bay special teams coordinator Mike Stock said. "In this league you need someone who specializes in long snapping, not someone who does it on the side." Stock said he's not surprised Davis has lasted so long in the NFL.

"He's one of the best," Stock said. "Just because he's not as well-known as some of the players on this team doesn't make his job any less valuable. You can't take a player like Rob Davis for granted."

Davis said he doesn't know how many times he's botched a snap during his time in Green Bay. "I can think of a few times, but I don't know the exact number," Davis said. "I know it's not a lot, because if it was a lot, I wouldn't be here."

At 38, Davis is the oldest player on the Packers roster and he said it can be difficult to watch some of the veterans leave. Just this off-season, Davis has had to watch fullback William Henderson get cut after 12 years in Green Bay and running back Ahman Green leave after seven seasons.

"I know it's part of the game, but it is hard to see those guys leave," Davis said. "People tell me all the time that sometimes it seems like Brett and I are the only (veterans) left."

Davis and Favre are the only holdovers from the Mike Holmgren era. In fact, receiver Donald Driver is the only other player on the roster who played for Ray Rhodes during the 1999 season.

Being such a longtime NFL veteran has given Davis something that most of the younger players on the Packers roster lack, and that's perspective. After playing for four different coaches on teams that ranged from the one that went to the Super Bowl in 1997 to the one that went 4-12 in 2005, Davis knows when a team is heading the right direction and he knows when one is heading south.

"I've been on some good teams and I've been on some teams that weren't so good," Davis said. "There are some years when you come to training camp and you know you're going to be really good and there are years when you know it's going to be a struggle."

Davis said it wasn't difficult to tell what kind of season the last one was when the Packers struggled early, but rebounded to finish a very respectable 8-8.

"We took some lumps last season, but what was so great about it was that toward the end of the season you knew we were a team on the rise," Davis said. "You love to watch young players get better and better and it let everyone know that Coach (Mike) McCarthy has this team headed in the right direction."

Davis enters 2007 having served 10 years as the Packers' long snapper.

Players Not Alone in Traveling the Rehabilitation Road

By Nathan Hager

Someone once said that you don't know what you have until it's gone.

While some may feel it's a tired cliché, don't count Brady Poppinga and Marviel Underwood among them.

Then again, both Poppinga and Underwood had the game they love so dearly - one they have poured so much blood, sweat, and tears into throughout their lives - nearly taken away from them due to devastating injuries.

While Poppinga made a strong recovery and recorded 60 tackles as a starting linebacker last season, Underwood is hoping to find similar success this season at safety.

Needless to say, both players faced an uphill battle and just as Poppinga did last season, it also appears that Underwood will prove that you can achieve a successful rehabilitation with the help of doctors, athletic trainers, teammates, and coaches. Not to mention a great deal of determination and hard work.

According to Bryan "Flea" Engel, an assistant athletic trainer who has been with the Packers since 1997, there are several obstacles to overcome in the grueling rehab process, but perhaps none more challenging then the mental aspect.

"Physically, they're going to get better," Engel said. "They're going to walk again, they're going to run again, and most likely, they're going to play football again. But mentally, they have to trust the body part that's injured or reconstructed and have faith that it's going to hold up under the stress and strain they put it under."

Underwood agrees wholeheartedly.

"The physical part is not hard," Underwood said. "Basically, it's knowing that you could probably play and give it all you have, but realizing you're better off just taking your time rather than going out there and messing something up."

Of course, telling some players to "take it easy" or "slow down" just doesn't work too well. After all, they probably didn't get to the NFL with a patient approach. Now, just imagine trying to tone down someone like Poppinga, one of the most intense players on the Packers' roster.

Even Poppinga admits that he couldn't keep himself in check, but fortunately, others could. He credits the athletic training staff, as well as strength and conditioning coordinator Rock Gullickson and his staff, for helping him make a full recovery.

"They were vital because if it were just me, I would have done something physically before I should have and then lost ground," Poppinga explained. "They knew how my body would react to certain things.

"When I wanted to do something, they would tell me to hold back. I didn't need to make that cut right then, or go too low on my squats just yet. I could wait two weeks. Those types of things really made a big difference with me. I knew if I trusted them I was better off than if I tried to do it myself."

Engel and Gullickson both acknowledged that while it may be challenging to harness this urge to go full speed, it's sometimes even more difficult to reach that point in the first

"I try to put it in terms of driving from here (Green Bay) to Milwaukee," Engel said. "You know it's going to be a two-hour drive, but if you continue to look at all the signs for Milwaukee, it feels like you're never going to get there. But if you notice all the little towns or little mile markers along the way, it makes the trip go that much faster. And it's the same with rehab.

"There's stagnant time where they've achieved the full range of motion and all they're working on is getting their muscle tone and strength back so they can function where they normally did before. That's when you sometimes need to motivate guys."

Engel acknowledged, however, that both Poppinga and Underwood did a good job staying in shape prior to surgery, which helped in their respective recoveries. Obviously, that's one step towards getting back on track.

> "GETTING THE RIGHT PEOPLE AROUND YOU MAKES YOUR COMEBACK A LOT EASIER. A LOT OF TIMES, TEAMS PUSH YOU AWAY AND TEND TO FORGET ABOUT YOU. BUT COACHES AND PLAYERS CAME AND TALKED TO ME, HELPED ME STAY FOCUSED, AND LET ME KNOW THAT I WAS STILL A PART OF THE TEAM."

And another, according to Gullickson, is a player's attitude. In fact, he said it could make or break a player's rehab.

"They have to take a positive outlook and they have to be so determined and know that they're in it for the long run because it's not an overnight fix," Gullickson said. "It's going to take a focused, everyday effort to get them there. Brady did that last year and Marviel has accomplished that this year, too."

Gullickson said that this process of helping players regain their form makes his job worthwhile.

"You see Brady go through the year successfully and that's one of the greatest feelings you have as a strength coach, because you know that in a small way, you had a hand in helping these guys get back on the field," Gullickson said. "That's a great reward in what we do."

In hindsight, Underwood acknowledged that having a year off from football might have been good for his body and watching from the sideline allowed him to learn the game better, too. And while he desperately wanted to help his teammates win games, it turns out that they aided him along the way instead.

Besides Poppinga, right tackle Mark Tauscher also suffered a similar injury five years ago and each proved they could make it back successfully, which gave Underwood hope.

"They came and talked to me and got me fired up about coming back," Underwood said. "Brady was one of the key factors. He said, 'I remember that, I did that.' And just watching him recover so well, that was a point I really wanted to get to.

Poppinga remembers watching the Packers preseason game at San Diego on television when Underwood injured his ACL and it didn't take him long to seek out Underwood, who also entered the NFL in 2005.

"I felt for him because I knew exactly what he was thinking," Poppinga explained. "I wanted to make sure that he didn't get down and let him know that you just have to let the rehab process work for you. Any time I was in the weight room, I just tried to offer words of encouragement and help him out."

Underwood, who hopes to pick up where he left off last preseason and continue his quest for a starting position, admits that he wouldn't have made it this far without the help of others along the way.

"Getting the right people around you makes your comeback a lot easier," Underwood said. "A lot of times, teams push you away and tend to forget about you. But coaches and players came and talked to me, helped me stay focused, and let me know that I was still a part of the team."

Now Underwood is looking forward to a successful comeback, much like Poppinga had last season. He admits his love for the game is stronger than ever, something Poppinga also quickly realized.

"You just forget how fun football is," Poppinga explained. "I was almost laughing to myself when I was out there because I was having so much fun that I couldn't hold back. Just running around, hitting people, running over people, going over strategies, it was so fun. I just kept laughing."

So now you know there's no need to panic if you see Underwood laughing after he snares an interception or makes a jarring tackle. In fact, it probably just means he's having more fun than ever playing the game he loves.

Considering what he's been through, can you blame him?

Bob Mann

'Man of Quiet Dignity' Led the Way for African-American Players in Green Bay

By Martin Hendricks

Bob Mann's first day as a Green Bay Packer wasn't much different than it was for the many others who played before him or after him.

"I remember walking into the dressing room," Mann said in a November 2001 Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel article.

"It was quiet, but everybody was friendly. Almost all the guys came up and greeted me. I think (RB Tony) Canadeo was one of the first guys. I remember going out and having (QB Tobin) Rote throw me some passes. The first pass he overthrew and I caught it with one hand. He said, 'Nice catch.' I knew from his expression he was pleased to have someone else to throw to."

But less than 24 hours later, Mann's debut on Nov. 26, 1950, was historic for the Green Bay franchise, as the offensive end became the first African-American to play for the Packers in the regular season.

It was a game to remember.

In blizzard-like conditions, Mann contributed to Green Bay's 25-21 win over the San Francisco 49ers at old City Stadium before 13,196 hearty fans. He caught one pass and threw a key block on halfback Billy Grimes' 57-yard touchdown jaunt.

It was the Packers' final victory in a 3-9 season after a 2-1 start, with six consecutive losses heading into the 49ers contest.

"I remember Bob Mann as a man of quiet dignity," said Lee Remmel, team historian. "He made the best of what could have been a difficult situation. Largely because of the way he handled himself, it wasn't a big issue.

"He wasn't a very big player, 5-foot-11 inches, 175 pounds, but a competitor. He was a very productive player, leading the team in receptions and touchdowns in 1951."

Mann was signed by Green Bay as a free agent after his release from the New York Yanks. Mann, a former University of Michigan star, played for the Detroit Lions in 1948-49.

Mann was an honorable mention All-American at Michigan and a key member of the undefeated 1947 Wolverine team, 10-0, that crushed USC 49-0 in the Rose Bowl.

When he signed with the Lions, Mann joined running back Melvin Groomes as the first African-Americans to play for Detroit. He had a stellar season in 1949, becoming the Lions' first-ever 1,000-yard receiver with 1,014 yards to lead the National Football League.

His 66 receptions were second only to the Los Angeles Rams' Tom Fears, who set a then-NFL record that season with 77 catches. Detroit was in desperate need of a quarterback, and traded the third-year end to the Yanks for signal-caller Bobby Lane, a future Hall of Famer.

COLLEGE: University of Michigan

PACKER YEARS: 1950-54

PACKER HIGHLIGHTS: Led team in receptions (50), receiving yards (696 yards), and touchdowns (eight) in 1951. Played in 38 regular season games in Packer tenure. Inducted in Green Bay Packers Hall of Fame, 1988.

OTHER TEAMS: Detroit Lions, 1948-49; New York Yanks, 1950 (partial season)

JERSEY NUMBER: 31, 1950-51; 87, 1952-54

OCCUPATION: Attorney

DIED: October 21, 2006

Mann with teammate Billy Howton

Lane and the Lions went on to win NFL championships over Cleveland in 1952-53 and lose to the Browns in the 1954 title contest. Mann never experienced a winning season in Green Bay under head coach Gene Ronzani from 1950-1953 and Lisle Blackbourn in 1954.

Ronzani, who followed Earl "Curly" Lambeau as head coach in 1950, posted 3-9, 3-9, 6-6, and 2-9-1 records with teams that played poorly away from home and were out-manned defensively.

While playing in just the last three games for Green Bay in 1950, Mann breathed life into a listless aerial attack and positioned himself as a starter heading into the following season with six catches for 89 yards (14.8 yard average) and a touchdown.

Mann's best season came in 1951, when he was Green Bay's leading receiver with 50 receptions for 696 yards — a 13.9 yard average— with eight touchdowns. He was the second-leading scorer on the team with 48 points, while kicker Fred Cone led the way with 50 points. He also rushed the ball twice for nine yards.

He was the first Green Bay receiver since NFL Hall of Famer Don Hutson to record 50 receptions in a single season. And like the legendary Hutson, he too received special attention from Chicago coach George Halas.

In "Downfield: Untold Stories of the Green Bay Packers" by Jerry Poling, Mann said he once heard during a Bears game that Halas offered $50 to anyone who knocked off Mann's moustache.

"For $50 I would have cut if off myself," Mann said with a laugh.

Mann's production slipped in 1952 with 30 receptions for 517 yards (17.2-yard average) with six touchdowns, but he formed an effective receiving tandem with rookie Bill Howton, who had a superb season with 53 catches, 1,231 yards, and 13 touchdowns.

The Packers finished 6-6 that season, good for fourth place in the NFL's Western Conference, one game ahead of the rival Chicago Bears.

In 1953, Mann caught 23 Tobin Rote and Babe Parilli aerials for 327 yards and two touchdowns. He played in only two preseason games in 1954 with no receptions and retired after he tore knee ligaments as the Packers continued their losing ways with a 4-8 mark.

Mann wore jersey No. 31 his first two seasons, but was the first Packer to wear No. 87 beginning in 1952 until his retirement.

Gary Knafelc, acquired from the Chicago Cardinals in 1954, replaced Mann.

"I never played with him, as I was coming in as he went out," Knafelc said. "I didn't get to know him until years later coming back for alumni golf outings. Bob Mann was a very intelligent, sharp guy.

"(Quarterback) Tobin Rote, who was from Texas, thought Mann was a man's man. He was a very quiet guy, but he didn't take any crap. He was a very good receiver who handled himself well and had a very good career."

Mann's best season came in 1951, when he was Green Bay's leading receiver with 50 receptions for 696 yards—a 13.9 yard average —with eight touchdowns. He was the second-leading scorer on the team with 48 points, while kicker Fred Cone led the way with 50 points. He also rushed the ball twice for nine yards.

Art Daley, former Green Bay Press-Gazette sports editor, knew Mann.

"I got to know Bob Mann pretty well," Daley said. "He's the first black guy I knew, as there were no blacks in Green Bay in the 1950s.

"Once I used the term 'colored' in the paper, and he cautioned me about using that word in reference to black players. He said to refer to him as a 'Negro.' I wrote a lot of stories about him over the years and kept in contact with he and his wife, Vera."

Daley, 90, still resides in Green Bay and recalled two incidents on Green Bay road trips.

The Packers played the Dallas Texans in 1952 and, as was their custom at the time, practiced the night before the game.

"I remember walking off the practice field with Bob and since it was the South he wasn't allowed to ride the team bus and stay at the team hotel," Daley said. "I started saying what kind of crap is that and getting riled up, but Bob just said, 'Oh well, it's just politics.'"

Another time on the East Coast, the Packers faced the Colts in Baltimore.

"They allowed him in the team hotel for a meeting, but when he was leaving to catch a cab with teammate Dick Afflis, the cab driver said 'I can't take him,'" Daley recalled.

"Well, Afflis, who was about 250 pounds, later Dick the Bruiser (a pro wrestler), grabbed the cabbie by the shirt and said, 'You take him where he wants to go.'"

When inducted into the Green Bay Packers Hall of Fame in February 1988, a proud Mann said he didn't consider himself a "pioneer" in Green Bay.

"Times change, necessities change, and people become accustomed to those things (blacks in white communities)," he said. "I just hoped my actions were such that I didn't deter future black players from going to Green Bay. I didn't have any problems at all. People treated me well."

Remmel remembered Mann's induction speech to this day.

"He was a very bright and intelligent man," Remmel said. "He gave a great speech and had everyone eating out of the palm of his hand. He went on from Green Bay to return to Detroit and become a very prominent attorney."

For more than three decades, Mann specialized in criminal and personal injury law and was active in community affairs in Detroit. His law firm, Bob Mann & Associates, was located just a few blocks from Ford Field.

Mann also served as an honorary captain at several Lions and Packers football games over the years. He died at the age of 82 in October 2006 in Detroit.

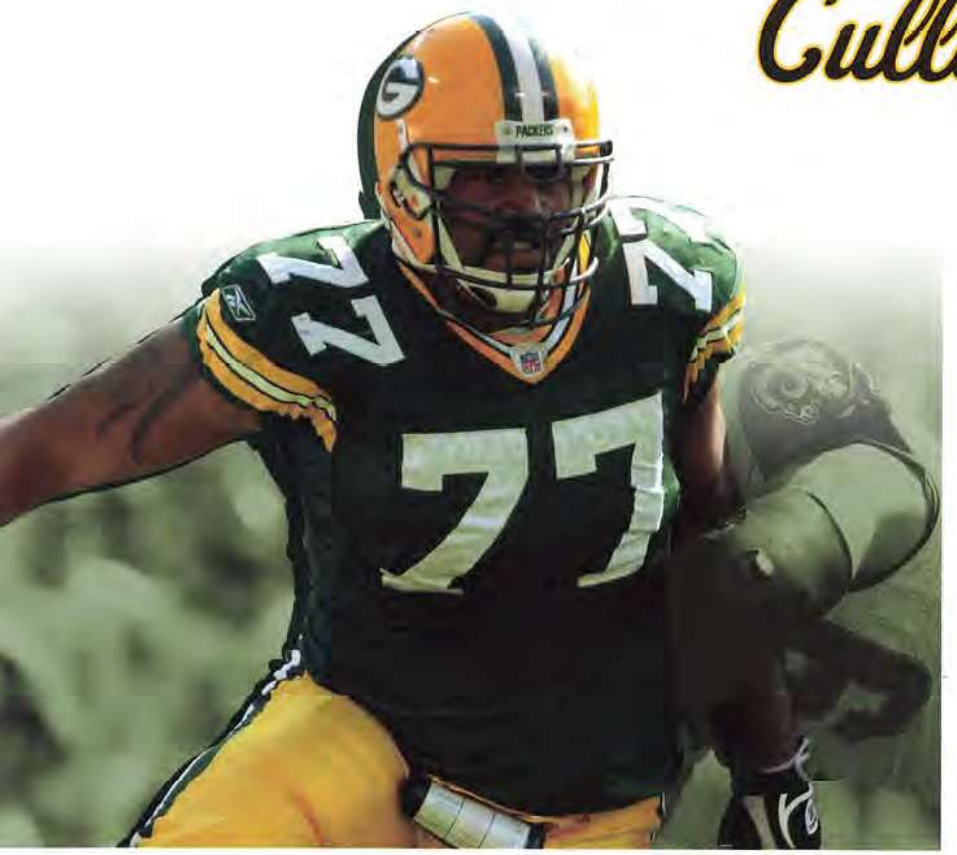
Persistence Pays for Cullen Jenkins

By Peter Jackel - Racine Journal Times



A little bit anxious and quite a bit depressed as he took the load off his feet every late afternoon, Cullen Jenkins used to pull off mud-caked shoes, a sweat-soaked shirt and grass-stained pants.

One year earlier, he was also pulling off filthy work clothes, but that's when he was a decent prospect as a defensive lineman for Central Michigan University, not just another unwanted NFL free agent coming to terms with a backbreaking job and a silent cell phone.

And as he contemplated if there would ever be more to life than landscaping – that is, when rain deprived him of a day's wages – darned if the walls of his way-too-cramped apartment in Belleville, Mich., seemed to close in more and more by the day.

Somewhere west across the waters of Lake Michigan during that autumn of 2003, meanwhile, the Green Bay Packers were making a strong run toward the Super Bowl, a run that was destined to be ended by that infamous fourth-and-26 game in Philadelphia. But Green Bay might as well have been in another universe for Jenkins when the undrafted free agent was waived in the Packers' first mandatory roster cut in August 2003.

Living in cramped quarters with his mother-in-law, wife and two small daughters, Jenkins used to force himself to work out for an hour or so after another grueling day landscaping for Stempky Gardens. And then he would collapse into bed, with an alarm clock set at 6 a.m. beside him, prepared to awaken him to another miserable day.

"It was pretty grim," Jenkins said. "I'm telling you, you come out of the bedroom and you're right there in the living room and kitchen. Everybody was just right there. So you were pretty cramped."

Going on four years later, Jenkins' living quarters still aren't overly spacious – he lives in half a duplex in De Pere and rents out the other half – and he still undresses from dirty clothes every night. Only this time, he's firmly entrenched as a defensive end for the Packers and he has the security of a lucrative four-year contract, which he signed just before coming a restricted free agent last February.

How does one progress from a reluctant landscaper who was just another of the endless names on the waiver wire in 2003 to a well-paid linemen who is considered to have a considerable upside? With the same clichéd characteristic that has been the basis of so many corny Hollywood films of personal achievement – heart.

"I've always tried to stay focused," Jenkins said. "You always have to keep that drive because you have high times and low times and, at the end of the day, you just have to stay focused and stay determined."

In 2003, defensive linemen Kenny Peterson and James Lee were drafted. And in the 2004 draft, prior to which Jenkins was re-signed by the Packers and allocated to the Cologne Centurions of NFL Europe, defensive linemen Donnell Washington and Corey Williams were added to the roster.

Sure, all but Williams are long gone now. But no one could have known they would be rejects at the time.

"I just tried to work hard," Jenkins said when asked how he mentally overcame such perceived competition. "I know when I came back from Europe, after they drafted the two D-tackles again, I just had the mindset that I didn't care. I felt like I wasn't up here trying to make the Green Bay Packers team. I was up here trying to make another team's roster.

"I was busting my butt and I was just telling myself that I was going to get into a preseason game and play my butt off. That way, whatever happens and, hopefully, another team will pick me up."

Someone in Jenkins' shoes needs breaks and that's exactly what he got in 2004. Surviving the cut that year, Jenkins was able to dress for the Packers' season-opening Monday night game against the Carolina Panthers only because Peterson was out with a shoulder injury.

With his brother Kris, the Panthers' highly regarded defensive end looking on, Jenkins did more than take up space when he was rotated on to the Bank of America Stadium turf during the Packers' 24-14 victory that night. He played every down as if it could be his last - which still could easily have been the case during that point of his career.

"I went out there and played and ended up doing pretty good," Jenkins said. "I graded out pretty good in that game. It shocked me because, after that game, I felt, 'I can do this, you know?' Because Carolina was a pretty good team and to go out there and do it against them, I felt I had accomplished something and just carried it over to the next game.

"After that, it started to become more consistent and I expected it from myself then."

And for Jenkins, the operative word as far as his future in the NFL slowly evolved from "surviving" to "thriving."

Gradually, he worked his way into the Packers' plans as Peterson, Lee and Washington faded into obscurity. And by late in the 2006 season, he had replaced long-time incumbent Kabeer Gbaja-Biamila at right defensive end.

His true coming-out party might have been in a 17-9 victory over the Detroit Lions at Lambeau Field Dec. 17, when he had three sacks for 30 yards in losses and seven tackles.

"It just seems like everything went right for me in that game," Jenkins said. "Anything I did, it seemed like it was the right move. I did the right stuff. It seems like everything just happened perfectly."

By the end of the season, Jenkins had compiled 6 1/2 sacks, which ranked third on the team, 48 tackles, 28 of which were solo, two passes defensed and two fumble recoveries in 409 defensive plays.

It had taken awhile, but Jenkins had arrived. And the lesson was again underscored that sometimes the most highly-rated defensive linemen over the years (such as Kenneth Sims and Courtney Brown) fail to amount to much while jewels the likes of Steve McMichael and Jenkins can be found on the free agent scrapheap.

"He didn't really have the numbers to match up," Packers defensive tackles coach Robert Nunn said of Jenkins. "He was a quick guy, but he was kind of a 'tweener' as far as size was concerned.

"So, yeah, he was probably overlooked because he didn't have the numbers that stacked up against other guys. But the thing he can do is really play with good leverage and his quickness just continues to show up and he just gives people a lot of trouble."

What does this all mean? That a defensive line comprised of Jenkins, Aaron Kampman, Ryan Pickett and No. 1 draft choice Justin Harrell just may become a dominant unit for years to come.

And who knows? Jenkins just may develop into the best of the bunch.

"He had a bright, bright future ahead of him," Nunn said. "The biggest thing is just getting lucky and staying healthy. If he does that, because he can play inside and outside and go inside on rushing downs and still be able to go outside, too, he brings a lot of value.

"If he can stay healthy, he's going to have a job for a long time in this league."

What can we all learn from Jenkins' story? Just ask his wife, Pashun, who has seen a broad gamut during the last few years.

"Never to give up, because dreams do come true - as long as you keep working and keep believing," she said.

NFC North Outlook

By Pete Dougherty - Green Bay Press-Gazette

The race is on in the NFC North Division to see who can catch the Chicago Bears.

Finishing as last season's NFC Champs, Chicago clearly remains the team to beat despite a tough offseason that saw them lose two of their top four defensive tackles (Ian Scott and Alfonso Boone) in free agency, and a still unsettled situation with Pro Bowl linebacker Lance Briggs. The Bears didn't put up much of a fight to retain either of the defensive tackles because they're getting back Tommie Harris, who is one of the NFL's premier defensive tackles even after his 2006 season was ended early because of a hamstring injury.

With Harris and middle linebacker Brian Urlacher, the NFL's defensive player of the year in 2006, the Bears have the core of a formidable defense. Briggs is a good player but has asked for a trade after the Bears put their franchise tag on him and the sides were unable to work out a long-term contract. If the Bears end up trading him before the start of the season they'll feel the loss, but as long as they have Urlacher and Harris they'll be a good defensive team.

The biggest issue is whether quarterback Rex Grossman can improve substantially and get the Bears' offense over the hump. With halfback Thomas Jones traded to the Jets in the offseason, former first-round pick Cedric Benson becomes the go-to back for the first time in his career. This year's first-round draft pick, Greg Olsen, could give Grossman a weapon at tight end that he's lacked. Return man Devin Hester – who is a game-breaker capable of scoring regularly – was moved to WR to provide a spark.

Detroit has the most intriguing offensive talent in the division, though it ultimately will depend on whether veteran journeyman quarterback Jon Kitna can get the most out that playmaking talent. With first-round pick Calvin Johnson, whom many scouts considered the most talented player in this year's draft, and Roy Williams, the Lions have as gifted a starting receiver duo as any team in the NFL. If halfback Kevin Jones can come back from the bad foot injury that ended his '06 season, the Lions will have a running game that has to be honored.

Rod Marinelli now is in his second year coaching the team, and with his Tampa Cover 2 defensive system in place will try to make up for the Lions' personnel shortcomings on that side of the ball, where they added no players of note and lost cornerback Dré Bly in a trade. Defensive end Ikaika Alama-Francis was the Lions' highest-drafted defensive player, a third-rounder.

Minnesota appears to have the longest way to go, but only because the Vikings are starting a raw, second-year quarterback Tarvaris Jackson after parting ways with Brad Johnson in the offseason. Unless Jackson develops faster than expected, the Vikings are sure to suffer some growing pains that will cost them games. Plus, the Vikings have major questions at receiver, where former first-round pick Troy Williamson has been a disappointment. Rookie Sidney Rice, a second-round pick, might upgrade that unit some.

However, they have two key factors that could help keep the Vikings in games: A potential stud running back, and a top defense. Minnesota's first-round draft pick, Adrian Peterson, could prove to be a big help to Jackson if he's the big-play halfback that many scouts predicted when they selected him No. 7 overall.

Also, with defensive tackles Kevin Williams and Pat Williams, Minnesota has as good a defensive-tackle duo as anyone in the NFL. Though the Vikings are sure to miss defensive coordinator Mike Tomlin, who became Pittsburgh's head coach this offseason, they're still strong up the middle and will add former first-round pick Chad Greenway in the starting line-up at weakside linebacker after he missed his rookie year because of knee-reconstruction surgery.

The Packers, in the meantime, built on an already ascending defense by selecting defensive tackle Justin Harrell in the first round of this year's draft. If Cullen Jenkins' move to starting defensive end proves as effective as it did in the final four games last year, then Harrell's addition will give the Packers their strongest front four in years.

Offensively, the Packers will need some players to step up and score points. They selected halfback Brandon Jackson in the second round of this year's draft and will need him to be an immediately effective player if he, Vernand Morency and Noah Herron are going to provide a solid running game to take the pressure off Brett Favre at quarterback.

The Packers also are looking for third-round pick James Jones of San Jose State to make a run at the No. 3 receiver job and provide Favre with another much-needed weapon, adding to go-to-player Donald Driver and last year's rookie standout Greg Jennings.

Travel Time

When the Packers travel, Linda Nuthals gets them there

By Adam Woullard

On a blustery winter night, a Packers scout sits in an airport having just found out that his flight is cancelled... along with all other flights that night. Seemingly out of options, he reaches for his cell phone and dials an S.O.S.

The call is made to Linda Nuthals, the Green Bay Packers Corporate Travel Manager. For the past 12 years, she has negotiated the day-to-day comings and goings of Packers personnel, also helping coaches, players and other Packers staff with personal travel.

Nuthals began her affiliation with the Packers long before she ever even knew how to book a flight. She grew up only a short walk away from Lambeau Field and sold programs on the day of the games, and later parked cars when she was old enough to drive. Ironically enough, when she could, Nuthals would find a ticket to watch a game at Lambeau Field, the very stadium in which she would one day have an office.

Nuthals got her start in travel in January of 1983. Upon completing her travel agent certification program in Green Bay, she started as a tour director for a local company, escorting tourists on bus trips around Wisconsin and bordering states.

After about a year on that job, Nuthals went to work for a local travel agency, working the phones right away and booking trips. Though she didn't know it would all work out the way it did, Nuthals knows that she wouldn't be where she is today without that initial experience in the business.

"I am very thankful for that first opportunity," she said. "It gave me the experience I needed to do what I'm doing today. They took a chance on me, and it has led to great things for me."

Her career with the Packers resumed in the summer of 1995. At that time, Nuthals booked personal travel for a Packers client, then Vice President of Administration, Mike Reinfeldt (currently Executive Vice President and General Manager for the Tennessee Titans). He approached Nuthals about handling the Packers' travel, hoping to find someone who could streamline the travel process in order to be more cost-efficient.

"I reviewed what the team was spending and the cost I could do it for," Nuthals said. "I discovered that over a sixth-month period, there would be substantial savings."

On Reinfeldt's recommendation, she became a top candidate for the position and ultimately met with former general manager Ron Wolf. He listened to her presentation and eventually decided to bring her in as an independent contractor in charge of arranging the team's daily travel.

Wolf hired Nuthals that summer and she has been with the organization as the exclusive travel person ever since. She moved her office to Lambeau Field in 1999 to more effectively manage all facets of team business travel – with the exception of the team charter that takes the team on road games – plus assisting many club employees in arranging personal travel.

While such responsibility might be a burden to some, Nuthals still carries excitement for this unique position. "I don't think a lot of teams have an employee in the same role as mine," Nuthals said. "Most teams either use an outside agency or split the responsibilities among existing employees."

Throughout her tenure, Nuthals' responsibilities have grown to include decision-making and meeting the daily demands of an ever-increasing organization and a progressively more competitive league. Facing weather-changes, cancelled flights, schedule changes and a variety of other obstacles, Nuthals is the organization's travel problem-solver and her contributions are far from unnoticed within the organization.

"When you're traveling, you're kind of out there by yourself," said Packers General Manager Ted Thompson. "If you get to an airport and your flight is cancelled, adjustments have to be made and Linda is always one step ahead.

"I know all the people who do a lot of traveling here certainly appreciate her efforts."

Nuthals works with the airlines and other travel organizations to make sure players and personnel alike not only get to where they need to be, but also that they get there on time. Having her office at Lambeau Field has helped her appropriately customize trips for individual travelers.

"By having someone like her full-time under the team's umbrella makes the organization's travel operation very efficient," said Danny Mock, College Scouting Coordinator. "She's looking out for the best interest of the team and staff, as opposed to going through a third-party business.

"Particularly dealing with weather options, it's vital to have someone who knows how to explore every option, and Linda uses every resource she has to get people where they need to be and she always does, one way or another."

Nuthals said one of the biggest advantages of working at Lambeau is getting to know the people she is setting up travel for.

"Once I moved my office here, communication improved, because someone can just walk down the hall to try and arrange something, as opposed to having to track me down via phone," Nuthals said. "Plus, you get to know people and their travel preferences. I know whether or not someone needs an exit row, their preferred airline - a lot of things like that."

> "THE BEST PART OF MY JOB IS THE CONSTANT CHANGE, THE CHALLENGE AND THE PEOPLE. THINGS ARE ALWAYS IN A STEADY STATE OF FLUX, SO I ENJOY THAT CHALLENGE AND I REALLY HAVE A PASSION FOR MY JOB."
> - Linda Nuthals

Though there is never a down time, Nuthals' workload largely depends on what is going on during the particular times of year.

"No day is ever the same," explained Nuthals. "There is never a checklist. I just need to make sure that I am available. There are periods during the year when I am on call 24 hours a day."

Once the off-season begins in January, Nuthals makes sure the players that do not live in Wisconsin find transportation to their homes. Also, if any changes on the coaching staff or in the front office occur, she quickly gets those individuals to Green Bay.

During the early off-season, she is also preparing travel for scouts attending college bowl games and the annual NFL Scouting Combine. Free agent visits also begin during this time.

Once April rolls around, the team brings in select draft prospects for visits. When the draft concludes, Nuthals arranges travel for the various camps that occur during the spring and summer. The team also has a program where it brings in the family of the recent draftees.

Needless to say, Nuthals doesn't have a problem keeping busy.

"There's constantly something going on," Nuthals said. "The busiest times are probably March and April. We make a lot of last-minute visits and changes."

Once the season starts again, the college scouts are then sent back out on the road to once again start scouting college prospects. Additionally, pro personnel scouts are sent out to watch other games around the NFL.

In addition to the aforementioned responsibilities, Nuthals also arranges travel for the various special events the Packers are involved with, such as annual events like Fan Fest and the Hall of Fame Banquet.

"There's always more and more travel, whether it be players, personnel, alumni, outside people such as guest speakers," Nuthals said.

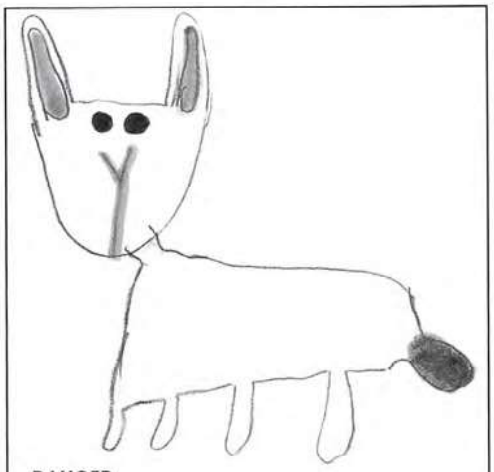
Dealing with a hectic schedule, Nuthals draws on the support of her family - husband Steve and daughters Courtney, 18, Kelsie, 15, and Mackenzie, 11.

"They help me out when I need it. When I am off, I try and do as much with my family as possible. We are all very busy and my daughters are all in sports, so we try to do something active when we can."

It is a sure bet that the next time a Green Bay storm hits, active is exactly what Nuthals' phone will be. Clearly, Nuthals has a lot on her plate as the team's travel coordinator.

However, instead of letting that serve as a detriment in how she goes about her job, it turns out she handles it just the opposite.

"The best part of my job is the constant change, the challenge and the people," she said. "Things are always in a steady state of flux, so I enjoy that challenge and I really have a passion for my job."



DANGER.

While the military fought the Taliban in Afghanistan with some of the most sophisticated weapons on earth, hundreds of young girls did it with number 2 pencils. That's because they attended CARE-assisted schools that taught girls alongside boys even while the Taliban were still in power, defying their ban on education for girls.

AT CARE, we've found that the poorest parts of the globe are consistently places where women are still marginalized, and denied a significant role.

That's why CARE today is focusing on empowering women around the world. In addition to educating young girls, we're offering "fast track" learning for older girls to help them catch up. We're providing micro-loans to help women start businesses. We're even helping women run for office to become agents of change.

We're trying to create a world where, finally, every person has the opportunity to realize their potential. Because, in the end, that's the key to truly ending injustice and poverty.

SHE HAS the POWER to change her world.
YOU HAVE the POWER to help her do it.

PAIN IS WEAKNESS LEAVING THE BODY.

THE QUESTION ISN'T HOW MUCH MORE CAN YOU TAKE, BUT HOW MUCH MORE CAN YOU GIVE. JUST WHEN YOU'RE READY TO QUIT, YOUR MIND SAYS PUSH HARDER. YOU LISTEN, SENSING AN INNER STRENGTH THAT WASN'T THERE BEFORE. AND SUDDENLY YOU DISCOVER-- YOU NO LONGER FEEL THE PAIN. NOW YOU'RE ONE OF US.
